And form so frail and mir. To me it seemed her gentle smile Was sweet as eventide, When softly shines the evening star

To say the day has died. Then warmly throbbed her breast with

Which gave to ev'ry tone Soft answer to the voice of praise From friends around her grown.

Oh, sweet the bliss, and dear the tim When youthful hearts best free; And beauty, love and joy entwine, As flow rets on the lea. When ev'ry thought and wish proclain

Desires of jayous pace,
And sincere souls see love and fame On fortune's dial face. When next I saw her fair young form

Twas at the altar rail, Pledging her faith, come sun or storm, Her heart would never fail.

There, to her soul, the coming years In their mystic beauty rose,
A home and husband—joyous fask— For love no bardships knows.

Sweet bome! What thoughts those words recall Of purest, holiest joy, Where souls unite in love's deep thrall,

Which time can ne'er destroy. Alas that dreams we fondly see, As we cross life's threshold fair. Should by a cold and stern decree Be changed to blank despair!

Two tombstones now their sad tale tell Of wife and mother gone. 'Tis years-and yet the solemn knell In one heart lingers on.
