Our Lay Sermon.

THE DUST!
The devil one day, in an amiable mood,
Sat him down on the end of a log;
"Think 'twould I did," "If I tried that I could!"
Make a man like the tail of a dog."

So he took from the ground a big hunk full of dust,
But the image he drew as he scrubbed,
That being neither brains, body, beauty nor blood,
"O, says Nick, 'the dust-thing is a Duke.'"
"But, John, why should you waste your time thinking about such subjects?"
"Because my dear friend, there is nothing in this world too insignificant for the scientific eye. There is nothing too great for the grasp of human intellect, and even what appears to us infinitesimally small may lead to results of profound import to the human race."

The speaker was a medical student who had nearly completed his course at the Pennsylvania College and was filled with the modern rage for scientific investigation. But neither did he limit himself to the extension of other people's influences. Among the more effective of these was the interest he had in the world of the past, and he had been studying the life of the Zooloical Garden.

Flora Zimmerman had for two years been engaged to John Morgenstern. All that Flora had to do in this world was to look beautiful and believe in John. She found no difficulty in accomplishing the first object of her life, and her belief in the second was as boundless as the truthfulness and simplicity of her own nature.
