DANIEL WIEAND,

Eggs in Early Winter and Egg-Producing Fowls.

There are certain methods to conform by all poultry fanciers that, if followed out, prove remunerative, without westing time or patience-that is, the proper care of poultry in winter to make him profitable as wel as productive. Eggs at this time of the year, fresh, are as profitable as any farm product, if not more so. With very little rouble heus can be made to produce them in paving quantities. In the first place poultry should have a good, warm housena that is roomy and comfortable, they should not be over fed, but the food which is given them should be non-fat producing. Care is the tirst essential to success. While eggs are worth in the market from thirty. five to forty cents a dozen it pays to look after things.

Our plan, which has proved successful, when we were breeding for the product of fowls as well as for the best breeds, has been to look well after the welfare of our birds and get as early winter producers of eggs as possible. Our feed has been cats browned, nush or cooked Indian meal, buck when !, wheat screenings, but very little whole corn, and refuse from the table. Plenty of fresh water was given daily, with coal ashes for a dust bath. Bones were thrown in the kitchen stove and burned until they were brittle, then taken out of the fire and ground and given them weekly. We have occasionally bought at our butchers a pluck or other refuse ment and hung it up in the hennery just in reach, so the fowls could fly up and peck at it. In this way they have proved with us successful egg producers We have kept all cockerels away from the hens until late in February, and thereby woided their sitting propensities. The breeds treated in this manner have been all of the Asiatic breeds. White and Gray Dorkings, Silver Spangled Polanda and White Leghorns. We have bred from these varieties of lowls for the past thirty or forty years and found no trouble in keep ing fresh eggs all winter long, as well as having early chickens. The Polish class of fowls have proved good egg producers, but their eggs are small and not stall on a par with those of the Leghorns. The Asiatic breeds proved, with us, early egg producers, but their persistence as incubators destroys, in our opinion, their us-fulness as early egg getters. As a table bird they are hard to beat as to size. Of course, the flesh is coarser grained than that of other varieties. If they were crossed with the Dorking variety they would prove a much better table bird, as far as buttery appearance of their flesh is concerned, and it would give them a much more plump ap pearance in our markets.

All prize fowls should be kept separate from the cockerels until at least as late as the 14th of February. After being mated or matched in the pens, all eggs gathered for incubating purposes should be kept in a warm place, or in a place where they will not be hable to become chilled. Early birds for the market are profitable-as much so as winter eggs. If you have a good, warm cellar to set the hen in we think it preferable to the hennery. The hens will be les liable to leave their nests for food, and their eggs will not become chilled and the gern killed. We have occasionally sprinkled the eggs of early sitting hens with lukewarm water, then turned them and put the ben on them again. We never have experied any bad results from this manner of
