ANGEL VISITORS.

In the graveyard gray and chill, Veiled in shadow, hushed and still, 'Tis he who, in the night...

Chances led him to the margin of a stream which separated the lands of Ambion and Boswode.

After he had left her Eleanor wandered along thoughtfully, revolving in her mind her duty toward her father and her love for her sister.

What their conversation was the chronicler saith not; but angry words had passed between Sir Sutton and Sir Wolstan.

They pledged themselves, therefore, to meet nightly at the same spot, and if one were detained the other should nightly repair.

“Well, Simon,” and how like't thou the sport our Boswode wood affords? 'Tis but a noble chase that we started, and a gallant chase he led us!” asked Sir Wolstan.

“Truly the chase was good and the game noble; but my thoughts were not with either,” said the young man.

“Marry, I know not; but last night, as I sat by my lattice, I saw two females, veiled—which I much suspect were your cousin and her maid—pass quickly in the shadow of the wall and take the path leading to the ruined tower.”

“Pshaw, man! Probably some of our village maidens returning ere the curfew toll, or perchance, some of our ancestral ghosts taking their nightly rounds. But this must be looked to; and I will watch with thee to-morrow, and should it be as thou sayest, death to the deceiver and thy instant nuptials with Eleanor!”

“I never forgive an injury,” said the young man.

“Between the two there had long sprang up a feud, which did fair some day to lead to deadly strife.”

“Sir Sutton, however, who was some twenty summers younger than Sir Wolstan, set out for the holy land to perform a vow, and thus an immediate quarrel was averted.”

“The lady of Sir Wolstan was dead, and had left behind her two sons and one daughter, who was remarkable for her beauty. Eleanor—for such was her name—was none of her father's qualities, but acting on every impulse, was at the same time so sensitive that she felt keenly his christenings, and by many secret acts of kindness and visits to the poor, had endeared herself to all around; and between her and Sir Sutton a secret attachment arose previous to his departure.”

“Nay, listen to me, fair lady, and let not thy father's enmity stand between us. Here I not in foreign lands withstood the wild fury of the horseman of the desert, and warded off the secret blows of the assassin? Have I not, in the open life, laid at my feet knight after knight without receiving a wound? And think'st thou, then, that thy father's words could frighten me, his menaces terrify me, or his threats drive me from my purpose? I will be up to him this eve, open my heart to him, with extended hand break the enmity between us, and claim thee, fair Eleanor, as my bride.”

“If thou wishest, Sir Sutton, to destroy all hopes of our union, to mar our future happiness, and run thy life into danger, then wilt do as thou sayest. This night Sir Simon de Montford tarrieth here, and thou knowest my father's wish to unite him to me. I shudder when I think of it, for I would sooner a viper would nestle in my bosom than that I should ever be called Eleanor de Montford!”

“But I brook not delay when so prolixous a garden is at stake, and that I may communicate to thee the result, be at my ruined tower when the curfew tolls.”

And with this Sir Sutton bounded away, and was soon lost in the thickness of the wood.

“But that our readers may know how this interview took place, we must inform them that Sir Sutton had just returned from his six years' pilgrimage, and was inspecting the changes that had taken place on his lands during his absence.”

THIS LIFE IS WHAT WE MAKE IT.

Let's cheerer talk of noble deeds, And rarer of the bad ones, And sing about our happy days, And not about the sad ones.

Let's find the sunny side of men, Or be believers in it; A light there is in every soul That takes the pains to win it.

Then here's to those whose loving hearts Shed light and joy about them! Thanks be to them for countless gems To us who have known without them.

Old this should be a happy world To all who may partake it; The fault's our own, if it is not— This life is what we make it.

A SEA-SHELL.

It is not much of a story, but it would have been a great deal happier one if it had not been for the little pink twisted shell which Jack Wallace found and gave to Dora Carter down on the beach the day Jack sailed for Bombay.

They had spent the afternoon there on the beach, walking up and down, arm in arm, or sitting on some bit of broken spar, Jack's arm about her waist, and her little brown hand clasped closely in his great strong fingers.

“Well, Simon,” and how like't thou the sport our Boswode wood affords? 'Tis but a noble chase that we started, and a gallant chase he led us!” asked Sir Wolstan.

“Truly the chase was good and the game noble; but my thoughts were not with either,” said the young man.

“Marry, I know not; but last night, as I sat by my lattice, I saw two females, veiled—which I much suspect were your cousin and her maid—pass quickly in the shadow of the wall and take the path leading to the ruined tower.”

BILL NYE'S TROUBLES.

No man knows how much the human heart can endure and yet not burst until he has seen his portrait published a few times. Then he realizes the wealth of wood that one soul may wrestle with, and yet not become unburied and loosened from its final tenement of clay.

Bill Nye's troubles, no man knows how much the human heart can endure and yet not burst until he has seen his portrait published a few times.
