ing at her dress he began to look at her face. Her long eyelashes were for the most part downcast.

After dinner, when the gentlemen joined the ladies, he went straight up to her and sat down beside her.

"The women, for instance, they look so strange; so—almost bold and unfeeling. I suppose it is because my eye is unaccustomed.

"I am sure you are not," answered Jack very fervently, although why he was so sure of it, would have been puzzled to say.

Gray in existence. "Oh, what shall I do?" cried Lady Ellerton, wringing her hands and almost in tears.

"No, who is there? Miss Ritchie does the sprightly old maid, and Mrs. Halket the timid mother, and Colonel Spriggs the heavy father, and George Andrews the lover.

"At such a short notice, and such a part, so wholly foreign to her nature! Poor little girl, how can she do it?"

"I am sure you are not," answered Jack very fervently, although why he was so sure of it, would have been puzzled to say.

The next morning, Miss Rose had taken her departure before the rest of the party assembled at a late breakfast table.

"The hall was crowded; the party from Postborough Court arrived very late. As Jack Dorner edged his way through the block of people at the doorway, his eyes ran eagerly over the bright parterre of well-dressed women; he saw there many beautiful faces, many brilliant dresses, much glitter of diamonds upon white necks and arms, but nowhere the little grey dress and the quiet demure face of the girl he looked for; a pang went through his heart; she was not there, then! Thus suddenly, through an opening in the crowd, he saw—what?

"A lovely woman clad in white, but white that was not so much the garb of virgin simplicity as the imperial whiteness of a queen, while that shone with the lustre of rich satin softened by the fall of costly lace; diamonds sparkled at her throat and ears, and glittered in shining circlets about her round white arms.

"How late you are—will you dance with me?"

"Will I not?" he answered, passing his arm round her waist.

"I have tried to make myself lovely in your eyes."

"Because I love you," she answered simply.
