It has been a current opinion for centuries that places of burial are haunted by specters and apparitions, a notion indeed that prevailed as far back as the times of heathenism.

An End to Bone Scratching. Edward Shepherd, of Harrisburg, Ill., says: "Having received so much benefit from Electric Bitters, I feel it my duty to let suffering humanity know it."

The Denham Feud. BY ELEANOR C. LEWIS. How long ago, or just why, Francis John and John Francis Denham, half-brothers, began to quarrel with each other, will be hard to say.

Why is it, he sometimes mused, "that I do my duty, and am disliked for it, while Frank, who never thinks of his duty, is loved?"

Meanwhile, the "little rift in the lustre" grew larger. Frank got into debt; Francis, with strict justice but little mercy, said he could not spare the money to help his brother out.

Why do Doctors Prescribe Liquors? Because they know not what else to do; or because sometimes a little liquor serves to kindle the exhausted fires of digestion.

—A blind boy preacher, 16 years old, is causing some excitement in Raleigh. A week ago he told his father that he had received a divine command to preach the Gospel, and would be made blind for a period of some days.

—Of course when a man is sound and well he don't care a copper for all the medicine on the face of the earth. He has no use for it. But when disease is eating his life out he wants the right prescription and he wants it right away.

—Gen. Lord Wolsley's appearance is decidedly effeminate, and when he speaks he accompanies each remark with a nervous shake of the head. He is disposed to be sociable, but is not a favorite with the "rank and file."

Many a person would turn to look at them as they passed, and in Mr. Denham's place of business a visit from the child was the event of the day. She took all this attention with a kind of serene unconsciousness; it neither excited nor troubled her.

One still, cold afternoon in January Francis Denham made haste home. "Why, papa?" cried Alda, running to meet him. "What brings you home so early?"

"You, my pet," he answered, gaily. "Be quick, there's a good girl, and have Janie wrap you up warm. Mamma lying down, is she? Well, you tell her that I am going to take you to hear Wilhelm, and will bring you back safe and sound."

No second bidding was needed. Alda flew like a fairy, and in a few minutes the carriage had left them at the Music Hall. Their seats were on the front row of the first gallery, about midway. They were hardly in their places and Alda's wraps unloosed, when Wilhelm entered, and all her attention was directed to him.

It was wonderful playing; clear, firm, masterly, yet with an undecorated passion of the spirit of music was there, as well as its body. Her father felt the beauty of the performance, but his strongest emotion, after all, was pleasure in Alda's pleasure. Now and then she looked up, long enough to appropriate his sympathetic smile, but was silent until the intermission.

Now and then she made an absurd pretence of looking through his opera-glass, and bowing to some imaginary acquaintance thus recognized. Next, she leaned her fairy arm on the balustrade, to peep down at the people below. Her glance roamed idly at first, then all at once grew earnest, for directly beneath sat her Uncle Frank.

The thought rushed over her: My chance at last! and at this moment her uncle looked up. His worn, tired, haggard, face met full the young and lovely one of his little niece. Something in her gaze arrested him; an indescribable expression of love and joy and longing.

He felt no anger toward her—who could?—and he smiled faintly in response to the pleading of her eyes. Alda drew back. The orchestral accompaniment of the next concerto began with a crash, as she pulled her father's hand near to listen, and whispered, breathlessly, "Uncle, papa, now is the time, and Uncle Frank will take it!"

No explanation was necessary. Her father understood, for he too has seen his brother's upturned face. He held out his hand, and with eager fingers she pulled off the ring. Once more she bent over the railing, and once more, drawn by some secret impulse toward god, her uncle looked up.

He saw two faces above him—the child's radiant and beautiful intention. And she held out the ring! The next moment it was his. No one heard her say it, yet he felt sure that her lips formed these words: "It is your own, dear uncle. I give it to you from my dear papa."

The old, hard anger melted from his heart like ice in the sun; he felt no impulse to refuse; on the contrary, he gently lifted the ring and put it on, then looked up at Francis and his daughter. No man's triumph touched his smile; the brotherly kindness of old days lighted up his eyes.

Then Alda, her work accomplished, leaned back and said: "It is all done, papa. Now we'll listen to Wilhelm." Very few persons noticed this little episode, and those who did, thought nothing of it; a child's freak, that was all. But with contentment was over, and Alda, muffled to the chin in white fur like a snow-sprite, came down the stairs with her father, and there was Uncle Frank waiting for them.

She threw her arms around his neck and kissed him, but though the brothers exchanged a hand-clasp that spoke volumes, no words were possible till they were out of the crowd. At the carriage-door Frank said rather huskily, "Did you mean it, Francis?"

"Francis," replied his brother, "I do mean it with my whole heart, and may God forgive me for not having done it before!" So the great Denham feud came to an end. The boys found each other delightful comrades, and wondered that they had never fraternized before. The wives exchanged receipts and confidences; the brothers renewed the amity of early days.

As for Alda, if she was not completely spoiled, it was due to the inherent sweetness of her nature, and not to her relatives, who thought nothing that could be done was enough for her. "She hasn't a fault!" said her Uncle Frank.

Here Mrs. Denham came in, and the conversation was broken off for the time. Alda had heard enough, however, to make up her mind. If Uncle Frank had the ring, her papa would be glad, and Uncle Frank would like it. Still, her papa could not give it himself, so some one else must give it for him, and that some one should be herself, just as soon as she could bring it about. She would not ask for the ring yet; she felt that for one reason or another she might be refused, and besides, she had a feeling that if she watched for it, a chance might appear, and all would be well.

Some time slipped by, however, and the coveted opportunity did not present itself. Her father grew better, and resumed business once more, but he was less absorbed in it than formerly. He found a good deal of time for Alda, and took her to ride, and especially to concerts, the little lady being fond of music. They were a noticeable pair—the tall, bearded, stately father, and the delicate child, with her transparent, vivid beauty.
