At certain seasons of the year dwellers on the shores of Galileo were more or less subject to fevers, owing to the heat and the marshy nature of the district. A rich man of Capernaum had a son who was thus taken sick about thi time. Human skill availed marght in his favor, and the anxious and loving parent turned his eyes anxiously towards Him who was said to be the great Header. He harried to Cana, some twenty or twenty-five miles distant, and at one songlit an interview with Jesus. The disciples had gone to their several homes, and the Savior was staying, probably, with a friend. Quietly enjoying that social and domestic his which was always a pleasure to Him, He is informed that a distinguished stranger wished to see Him. Christ not only blessed and sanctified the social and domestic relations of life, but He I wariably showed courtesy to those with whom lie came in contact. He received the stranger and heard his request. There stood the man, his whole nature stirred to its immed depths with the fear that his son might die.
