posed to fulfill their promise of accompanying him, he started off to the trying-place alone in a hansom, and arrived there exactly at the appointed hour. It had been a thoroughly wet day, and the rain had ceased so recently that the pavements were still shining, therefore there were very few people about. Thurston lit a cigarette, mentally decided not to waste more than five minutes, and then began to look leisurely about him.

As he did so, he became conscious of the figure of a woman standing close against the railings, watching him intently. She advanced straight up to him as his glance met hers, and accosted him. "Are you Jack?" she inquired, abruptly.

"Yes," replied Thurston, recklessly. They were standing beneath a street lamp, the light from which fell upon his face, while hers was in shadow. He could see, however, that she was a young lady, quietly and decently dressed. She scrutinized him for a few minutes in silence, during which Thurston, unable to control his habit of blushing, turned uncomfortably red.

"Maggie!" he murmured interrogatively, instinctively guessing that he was some other person. "Maggie can not come," said the young woman shortly. "I am her sister Helen. Follow me."

Thurston, completely taken aback by this peremptory request, and hardly realizing what had happened, followed his companion without a word. He was naturally disconcerted by this unexpected turn of events. He had never designed to personate "Jack," this response to the girl's question had come almost involuntarily to his lips. But having once done so, he resolved to wait and see what would happen, impelled by an adventurous spirit and the desire of having a good story to relate at the club.

The girl silently led the way along the Edgemoor road. She walked quickly, with her head bent; but the brilliantly lighted shops revealed that she was deeply pale. After walking several minutes without a word, Thurston began to feel somewhat embarrassed, and he attempted to utter some phrase of boyish gallantry. At the first word, however, the girl stopped him.

"Don't speak to me," she said, in a voice trembling with suppressed emotion. Young Thurston was so disconcerted that he had serious thoughts of disappearing down a side-street. One thing only was quite clear to him, and that was that the adventure he had embarked upon was very different from anything he had vaguely anticipated. The girl's appearance and manner precluded all suspicion of lightness of character. Her demeanor, indeed, impressed him with a feeling of solemnity. He could not for the life of him bring himself to explain that he was not the person he had pretended. At length his guide turned aside into a mean narrow street, and stopped before one of the poorest houses. Thurston, unfamiliar with the habitations of the poor, forgot his embarrassment in uncomfortable wonder and distrust.

her dead sister's breast as she spoke; there in an altered tone, and with a startling change of attitude and manner, she drew a letter from her pocket. "Except this," she added sternly; "this I was to give to you. It is your last letter. She did not believe you meant what you said in it."

"That is all," said the girl, evidently controlling herself by a great effort. "Unless you would like to kiss—"

"No, no," interrupted Thurston, in a whisper. "I don't think the worse of you for that," said the girl, dropping the curtain, with an air of relief; "of all lips, yours are most unworthy to touch her angel face. But she bade me to ask you."

She turned aside as she spoke, and Thurston began to edge towards the door. "I promised that I would not reproach you," said the girl, not attempting to hinder him, "but it was a cruel, heartless crime. We were alone, she and I—my baby sister. Times were bad, and I had to leave her for a little while. I thought she was safe, but you came by—you, a fine, rich gentleman. You plucked my poor flower, and then flung it aside. God forgive you."

Thurston, who was at heart an honest young fellow, was easily moved to genuine emotion. Innocent as he was of this deplorable affair, he was nevertheless simple and pure-minded enough to feel generous shame at the wrong that had been done. This, and unaffected sympathy for the grief and desolation of the elder sister, caused his blue eyes to grow dim with tears, which the girl noted.

"She hoped you would go to her funeral," she added in a softer tone, mentioning the time and place, "and put some flowers on her grave."

Thurston bowed his head and left the room. He reached the street in a painfully agitated and bewildered state of mind, and walked blindly back towards the club. But he did not return to the club to tell the story. He turned aside into Hyde Park, and walked aimlessly and absently westward across the open space, baring his head to the fresh night breezes. It is needless to speculate what depths of the young man's soul had been stirred by this tragic episode. It takes very little sometimes—a falling leaf, a chance word—to suggest serious and wholesome reflections.

two were alone in one of the small card-rooms, and there was no one to interfere in case of a disturbance. This reflection probably occurred to the elder man, and young Thurston's attitude was certainly aggressive. Mr. Vernon rather prided himself upon his discretion, and he manifested it on this occasion by slinking out of the room without seeking to prolong the interview.

Young Thurston, quite unnecessarily, as it turned out, sent a note to Mr. Vernon, stating where he was to be found next day, and adding that on the day after he proposed to leave England, possibly for a long period. Meanwhile, on the morrow, he was a spectator of a sad little funeral in a dreary London cemetery. There was only one mourner—a poor young girl, who appeared to much overwhelmed with grief to notice him. Young Thurston lingered, in rather a shamefaced, embarrassed way, among the tombstones at a little distance, until the mourner, at the conclusion of the short service, looked up at him. Then he came forward, and cast a wreath of white flowers into the grave.

"I believe my angel was right, and that you really loved her," murmured the poor mourner as she passed him. "Thank God for that, at least! Perhaps now, in time, I shall learn to forgive you as she wished."

SAVE THE CHILDREN. Detrimental food which, by reason of their superior strength, may not seriously affect the health of adults, as is well known, frequently acts upon the delicate organs of the child to produce disorders of the most serious character. The amount of laudanum or other poison which would be harmless to an adult will cause the death of an infant. This great difference between the vitality of adults and children is too generally overlooked in the preparation of food. Because no harm immediately perceptible comes to the adult by the use of an article of food, no thought is given to the delicate organs of inferior age.

Children die largely upon cake and bread, and these articles, if light, sweet and soft, contain a great quantity of injurious substances, are easily digested, nutritious and wholesome. There is a danger to our children, however, lurking in their bread and cake which few often look upon as dangerous. These articles are now leavened largely by baking powders, and when pure and wholesome baking powders are used they are perfectly safe. But when adulterated with yeast or cream of tartar and soda. The trouble arises from the fact as shown by recent scientific tests by the Government chemists and official boards of health, that all these baking powders, with the single exception of the Royal, contain either lime, iron, phosphorus, or acids of injurious character. Therefore when bread or cake is made with the use of these cheap baking powders these ingredients which are present through the efforts of the manufacturer to produce a cheap article pass into the food and are taken into the delicate organs of children where they are the cause of very much of the disease with which our children are afflicted.

Persons who have not strong constitutions, growing girls, young children, and nursing mothers are particularly liable to the evil effects produced by the introduction of the adulterated named powders into the system. The Royal Baking Powder, the only one of its kind, is made from the purest ingredients and contains no poisonous drugs and no poisons.

The matter is one of the greatest importance, particularly to the rising generation, and it is the duty of all parents and nursing mothers to study the subject carefully. These makers are making up their minds as to the proper legislation to stop the sale of the poisonous compounds, mothers will do well to study the subject carefully. The housekeeper will experience no inconvenience in discarding the use of the adulterated baking powder, if she has been using it, as the Royal Baking Powder, upon the purity and wholesomeness of which all the Government chemists agree, is equally accessible; but she will need to exercise a close watch upon her purchases from the grocer in order to prevent the inferior brands from creeping into her kitchen unawares.

—The New York Graphic describes a forthcoming volume as about half the size of a pocket-book. This is too indefinite. If it means Vanderbilt's pocket-book it would be a library in itself, but if our pocket-book is understood—the moral is obvious.
