feeding, and in summer time when the teams are worked hard, it is indispensable to their welfare. The skin of an animal is one of the most active exerctory organs, and is furnished with an enormous number of pores, through which passes a constant stream of moisture, that is charged with waste and offensive matter from the blood. Besides these there are thousands of minute glands in every square inch, which secrete an oily fluid which keeps the skin soft and pliable; and in addition, every hair on the skin is routed in a folicle or gland, which supplies the special putriment required for it. Moreover, the surface of the skin is continually wearing away as it is renewed by the new growth, and this waste. dry matter scales off; and needs to be removed by the curry-comb and brush When a horse is working, the excretion from the skin is profuse, and pours from it in the form of perspiration. When this dries on the skin it leaves a quantity of impure matter adhering to it, which i apt to close the pores and prevent the escape of the perspiration. This produces disorder, in the form of congestion of the myriads of capillary vessels which form a close net-work near the surface of the body' and the excretion and secretions being stopped, the skin becomes harsh, dry, contracted and diseased. > Improvement of Pastures. It is singular that so little attention is paid to this by our farmers, for there is no reason why the grass should not be as early in the spring, as late in automa, and as abundant on them as on the mowing lands. Instead, then, of its requiring three to four acres of pasture to carry a cow or bullock through the whole season, it would not be necessary to devot over the half of this, unless it happened to be particularly dry during the summer months. The great fault in managing pasture lands is, in letting them get in poverished, and turning stock upon them too early in the spring, and keeping them too late in autumn. Another thing, a afficient variety of seed is not sown on them. English farmers usually; sow from six to twelve sorts or more, and thus if the
