The Republican of that day had to wade through popular obloquy to maintain his convictions, much as the Prohibitionist must do to-day. The pioneers of the Republican organization were esteemed as cranks; and even their pragers offered to the God of free and slave, were jeered as unbefitting politieat efforts. But the Republican of 1855 and 1860 is not the Republican of 1886, and the sentiment which built up that organization to mighty proportions in so short a time is dead and buried under the wrongs of later days. It is a party of one idea, it learns nothing and forgets nothing. There are thousands of voters In its ranks who to-day fly the "bloody shirt' as they did twenty-five years ago, who still persist in keeping alive the almost smothered fire of the late civil war, The Prohibitionist, like the Republican of 1855, starts out with one idea firmly planted on his mind-to do away with the liquor traffic.
