ing to her feet, all her wealth of golden hair streaming around her. "That letter revealed the truth--that I was a wife--nobody, and, but for the mercy of the man who had been entrapped into marrying me while he loved another, it was pointless. Then he turned sharply on me, and accused me of knowing it all the time--of planning and plotting-- But he! let us talk of it. Aunt Marcell! You, at least, have been good and kind, as if I had indeed been what I was reared to consider myself. I am glad to know that I have never touched a cent of his money--that my own literary endeavors spare me that!" "You are not looking well, dear," says Mrs. Elliot, a little later, as she comes into the room suddenly in the twilight shadows, to find Kathleen leaning against the window, and looking out with weary, gleaming eyes. "The rest will do you good--you write too much. I have just completed arrangements to start for Long Branch next Monday." "A few moments' silence, then the slim, white figure turns slowly, showing a face of sweet, spiritual beauty. "And I have just received a letter from my husband--Mr. Montclair," she says slowly, "notifying me of his return to America, and that he would be with us on the eighth. By the seventeenth, Aunt Marcell, we must start for Long Branch!" "Kathleen!" in dismay but the only answer she receives is a reckless little laugh, and: "The seventeenth, sure! And let Mr. Montclair's visit be made to vacancy! We have existed without his lordship so far; we can do so still!" "I do not feel quite good enough to go to church this morning, Aunt Marcell," says Kathleen, with a little smile which brings out all the soft, exquisite dimples of her lovely face. "I must be growing reckless, fashionable and worldly-wise fast, because it is the first Sabbath in my life that I missed church." "She is making the loveliest picture in the world as she stands before her dressing glass, adjusting her white Gainsborough hair, and above the lovely, dainty face, and so thinks a gentleman passing through the corridor, and glancing in through the open door. When she pauses a moment as if to turn back, then: "Pshaw!" he says, with a light laugh, pursuing his way. "I could not be Kathleen. I wonder where the child can be! I was a brute to her--I deserve nothing better, but I am sorry that she hates me so much that she runs always at news of my approach! We always were friends before this unfortunate affair, and we might be still, and make the best of a bad bargain!" In the meantime Kathleen turns from the luxurious room, and runs lightly down the stairway followed by hundreds of envious and admiring eyes, for she is the belle--the one woman in Long Branch for whom Colonel Charteris has ears or eyes, and the verdict of the wealthy, elegant Colonel Charteris is the verdict of every one else. "I must escape them to-day," thinks Kathleen, darting out through a side door. "To-day I cannot even talk--I am too wretched! Just to think of his coming here! When I was beginning almost to fancy I might be happy without him, after all! Ah!" For her hurried walk, in which an artistic umbrella had shaded her eyes, brings her in the immediate path of some one coming from an opposite direction. Looking up suddenly with lovely eyes, just now dazzled by the sun's rays, she surveys the tall bronzed man with the handsome face and cultured look, who is standing in her pathway; then she draws back with a low cry of dismay. She does not see the glad light which leaps into his dark-brown eyes. She does not notice that, involuntarily he stretches out his hands. She only knows that, after three weary years, she has met him at last--the man who scorned and shunned her because he was betrayed into marriage with her while his heart was given to another. "That knowledge lends her pride and courage to hide the yearning of her own heart--desolate all these years. "Ah!" she says, coldly, having a tight, passive hand, which chills him to the heart. "It is you, Mr. Montclair. It is long since you have been amongst us so that I hardly recognized you. One so easily forgets faces when they see so many." "So, while her heart cries out in hot rebellion, which made this man so much to her, yet nothing at all in reality; and while he thinks that she is the loveliest woman he has ever seen, and somehow tingles with delight at the thought, they return slowly to the hotel, formal and polite as strangers. On the balcony, Colonel Charteris advances toward her, his handsome, blonde face full of passionate admiration, which causes Fred Montclair to clench his hands in sudden rage. "My dear Mrs. Montclair!" exclaims the Colonel, scarcely noticing the man. "You promised to let me give you a row this morning. The water is beautiful. I shall be in despair if you retract your promise." "I would not be guilty of such a thing," she laughs softly. "In a few moments, if you will wait." And while Fred stands beside Aunt Marcell, she excuses herself with a little formal apology, to row with her most ardent admirer. "You will lose her yet," says Mrs. Elliot, warmly. "Colonel Charteris is a dangerously handsome and fascinating man, Fred, and this is a compliment to your stupidity--one who has culture and sense enough to appreciate Kathleen. What fools you young people are--as if life were made to quarrel away. But you will lose her yet; even now she could obtain a divorce on the plea of desertion; and if she does, it will serve you right!" The summer days glide by, and, in the society of others, Fred is a stranger to his wife. In balls, parties, excursions, and pleasures of all kinds, Colonel Charteris is her devoted cavalier. Fred grows moody and irritable. After all she is his wife--she has no power to alter that now--and she should be a trifle more considerate. When he sees her gliding down the long, brilliant ball-room to the strains of a sweet,
