THE MOTHER.

BY RICHARD LEW DAWSON.

On his hook to see it squirm. In the spring a young girl's fancy

With a lovely ten-cent gleans.

In my heart a tender song

Has been sounding very long

And shall be the last to roll

Over my departing soul; It was heard in hours of pain

Borne in patience for my gain;

It was shown in loving eyes, It was taught my lisping tongue,

And I would it might be sung

The pure song of mother's love!

Mother's love! O, who shall measure

All the meanings this may treasu e? Weary years of toil and sorrow,

Self-denial, asking none, Faith whose course is never run-

Mother's tove, it never qualls, Till at last the great soul falls,

Then in vain regret we pind

O my mother, now to you

May my gratitude be true,

Summer has been full of storm.

Winter now enfolds your form,

And your head begins to show

From that dear familiar face,

Of your childhood long ago, Be one child who did not wait

Mother's love, kiss and caress, motion on her features, as she said:

you have been away but four weeks,"

"Now, Felicia, dear, tell me all the news

To return before too late

All her latest days to bless,

to while away the hours?"

Bring your eyes the happy glow

Traces of the falling snow,

Yet would I each care crass

Hopes the sinking heart would borrow

Prayers that rise through seas of tears, Foud devotion fraged with fears,

And the trembling bands are dropped. And the dauntless heart is stopped!

Sweet as angel's sing above-

It was sung to hush my cries,

For its tones so wondrous sweet

Were the first my ears to greet,

Things are not just what they seem.
