RUPTURE

The Improved Dorset Pig. The Dorset pig of this day is a result of the union of the improved blood of Wiltshire and Hampshire, and these are the product of judicious intermingling of the old Essex, the Chinese, and the Neapolitan stock with the native stock of those sections. The situation of the county, adjoining Hampshire and Wiltshire, makes reasonable the suggestion as to the source whence the improvement has been derived. For bacon, Willshire is, and for generations has been, celebrated, as has been Yorkshire for hams, and Dorset is a strong competiton of both, with its improved pigs, which are persistent winners of prizes at agricultural shows. It seems probably, too, that the Berkshire played a very important part in the improvement of the Dorset pigs, for the present breed of Berkshire is a moderatesized animal, soundly built, short in the sized animal, soundly built, short in the leg, with a short, arched neck, heavy Mouldings, Cabinet cheeks, shary ears, an upright forehead. while the barrel is very good, the back broad, and the whole shape up to the buyer's standard.

There are few sections of country, either the United States or England, into which the Berkshire pig has not made its way, and everywhere its excellent qualities have made it a favorite on account of its moderate size, small bones, thin skin, case of fattening, and the character of its flesh. and mixing its blood advantageously with that of all other strains and races. The improved Leicester, also, and the improved Essex have bestowed their good qualities freely upon other lines, and it is from all these combinations, so interwoven, as to leave the exact source of supply indistinct, under the modern system of inter-breeding. that the valuable breed of Dorset has been
