OVER THE BRIDGE WE PROMISED. She was not an heiress then, but a poor, ambitious girl.

She would have recalled him the next day, but it was too late. She had been too late.

Now they stood hand in hand, and it was "Bertram" and "Velma" as of old. The girl's heart throbbled with strange joy.

"You will forgive me, if I have not said so already, but I love you, and I love you, and I love you."

"Bertram, why were you so bashful?" she asked, with a sad smile. "You never loved me."

Those reproverful tones, that so long ago broke down the barrier of Velma's reserve.

"Oh, you would not say that if you could read my heart. I do not blame you; I love you, and I love you, and I love you."
