LOVE.

A voice of pity strove to bless In accents thoughtfully knit, But still my grief knew no rest.

The pretense made herself my slave, Her hand she had poor kindness gave, Till all was spent.

At last, her duty all fulfilled, She turned with cheerful ease away, Yet would have lingered, had I willed That she should stay.

And in that gaze I woke once more To earth and heaven above— This was not kindness as before, But only Love.

men on the post, and they were laughing as we drove on.

The inner picket did not stop us at all and we drove into town in the gray of the morning.

Although the hour was early, everybody was astir and the streets almost blocked with army vehicles.

During the last half mile of the drive the young man inspected me very closely, and when I left him he did not seem altogether satisfied as to my identity.

He asked me several questions about Gunton, which I had to answer at random, and my account of how “my son” had left home was not as clear as it might have been.

My first move after losing sight of the milkman was to get to a hotel. There I boldly registered as John William Richardson, Mobile, and dropped a hint to the clerk that I was furnishing Beauregard with supplies.

As soon as I went to my room I peeled off my outer suit, removed my hat and spectacles, took out three of my false teeth, which were on a plate by themselves, blackened my eyebrows, and in ten minutes I was in a new disguise.

I went down to breakfast, and then slipped over to the other hotel and registered and took a room as Professor E. G. S. LaDue, New Orleans. I had the French twist to my speech, and I also had a discreet hint to the clerk that I was furnishing Beauregard with supplies.

It was about 10 o'clock when I started out, and who should I run against the very first thing but my friend of the milk business. He had a sergeant and three privates with him, and as they passed me he said:

“Oh, I can tell him a mile off. His gray gig got rumpled up, and I saw light hair under it, but he was off before I knew what to do.”

I followed them to the hotel where I had first registered, and entered it just as they went up stairs to my room. They thought they had their man, but were doomed to disappointment.

Two of the men were left in the office, however, while the other two, accompanied by the milkman, went to look for me on the streets.

This was on the 20th of May. Beauregard had concentrated everything on the short line, and the Confederates believed they had a sure thing in case they were attacked in their intrenchments.

I picked up the milkman, however, and one of a dozen army officers before night, and the subject of the new explosion proved interesting to all. They pumped me for particulars, of course, but my reply was:

“In a day or two I hope to make a test and surprise the Yankees.”

Through the influence of a Captain Johnson, belonging to Marmaduke's command, and who had been wounded and carried his right arm in a sling, I secured a pass to carry me about Corinth, and on the second day of my arrival I posted myself in many details.

Everything was excellent and bubbling, as everybody thought a great battle imminent, and nobody paid any attention to me. At my solicitation Captain Johnson reported my arrival to Beauregard's adjutant, and asked permission for me to experiment. He came back and said:

“I found him upside down, and he felt like ordering me under arrest for disturbing him.”

On the afternoon of the third day, while I was in the work, a cavalry company, part my hair in the centre and give a new twist to my mustache, and as I descended to supper my left eye had a slight squint.

After supper, as I sat in the office smoking, I observed the milkman moving about as if looking for me. I went directly up to him and said:

“My friend, were you looking for me?” “No, sir, was the prompt reply.

“But you were with the men who arrested me this evening.” “What are you the fellow we picked up near the depot?”

“I am.” “He looked at me from top to toe, with a puzzled expression on his face, and I remarked:

“I overheard you say something about my eyes. Is there anything wrong with them?” “No, sir.”

“But why did you point me out to the guard? Instead of my being a civilian, tramping about with the soldiers? I presume you hold yourself accountable for any trouble you may cause a gentleman?”

“There was an old man rode in with me the morning before. He called himself Judge Levinston and said he lived at Guntonville. No such man has ever lived there. This man also wore a gray wig and possessed the natural hair, which was a little reddish.”

“Well,” he told an affecting story, and I passed him in as my father. I believe he was a spy.”

“Yes.” “And the soldiers believe it, and want to find him.”

“And I hope they will. But you, my friend, must use more discretion. If you insist a gentleman you must be prepared to give him satisfaction. I feel that—”

“Say, I'm sorry about this thing and if you will let it drop. Come and have a drink.”

I held on for a while and then bridged the yawning chasm, and when he was ripe for it I said:

“I have a brother here—a citizen—who is just able to move about after a long illness. I want to get him away before the battle occurs. How far out do you live?”

“About nine miles.” “If I paid for it couldn't you take him for a week or two?”

“I'll take him without pay and be only too glad to do you a favor.”

“But I wouldn't have it that way. I bargained with him that he should receive $10 for his trouble, and that he should call at the hotel the next evening. Nothing was said about a week, but I intended to see to that. The next day Marmaduke's captain helped me to secure it. What I saw in Corinth satisfied me there would be no fight. While the Confederates were shortening their lines and intrenching, and while the great mass of soldiers believed that Beauregard was acting for an attack, the railroad tracks told the story. I saw that he was sending away guns and stores as fast as possible, and was likewise bringing in and sidetracking all the cars available.

Several locomotives had come up, and I believed I had right for suspecting a retreat from Corinth. This belief was strengthened on the last day of my stay by the confidence of the operator, who informed me that supplies for Corinth had been stopped down the road.

When evening came I had seen all that was necessary, and half an hour after supper I disappeared. The man who took my place was an invalid. He was very pale, weak, the legs, and spoke in a hollow voice. I chalked my face a bit, rubbed the black of my eyebrows, cut the corners of my mustache, put on a different style collar, and hollowed in my cheeks by suction. In that way I lengthened my face and made my cheek bones show very prominently. It was dusk when the milkman drove up. When he came in I stated that the professor, my brother, had been called to Beauregard's headquarters, and that I was all ready to be moving.

“Be so powerful sick, I take it?” he said, as he looked me over.

“Yes, very sick.” “Consumption?”

“I'm afraid so,” I gasped between coughing spells.

He offered to treat but I declined, and after indulging in a horn by himself he took up the bundle I had made up and helped me to the buggy. My pass was all right with the pickets, and the young man had enough whisky in him to be jolly. I found him at first, and in pursuance of a plan I had formed I pretended to be very nervous and excited. Every sound made me start, and the further we drove the more nervous I got. Fortune came to my aid when we had reached the right spot. We heard a great clatter of hoofs ahead and I yelled out that the Yankees were upon us and jumped out of the buggy and over a fence and into the woods. He was badly scared for the moment and ran back about fifty feet before seeking shelter. In a minute or two three cavalry horses saddled and bridled, came tearing down the road, and as a consequence the old horse in the shafts wheeled about and went towards Corinth with them. The last I heard of the young man he was trying to call to me and yell “Whoa!” in one breath. In two hours I was inside the Union lines and before midnight Gen. Halleck had my report. I was neither rewarded nor believed. Indeed I was very sorry I had not been more successful in my work, and especially after concluding my reports. I had my revenge, however, when the general woke up one morning to find Corinth evacuated and the enemy beyond his reach. Then he must have been satisfied of the correctness of my theories; but he was too sore and had too much dignity to send for me and admit it. Indeed, my existence had probably escaped his memory.

HOME OF LITERATURE. Office Boy—“Please, ma'am, the editor wants to know if you've got that article on ‘Order in the Household’ ready for the Women's Department.”

Literary Lady—“No, I haven't; I accidentally used all my writing paper to kindle a fire with, and my ink got spilled, and I can't find my knife to sharpen a pencil.”

Office Boy—“Please ma'am, he said if you wasn't ready, you should cut some article out of a magazine and send it over, because we must close the page.”

Literary Lady—“Tell him I would like to oblige him, but I've lost my shears.”

Mrs. McMillins hired an aged colored lady to cook, and gave her particular instructions about early rising. After she had got through, she asked Matilda what was the first thing she had to do in the morning.

“Get up and dress as usual.” “No such thing.” “De fust thing I must do in de morning an' ter make de fire.”

“No, it's the first thing you are to do.” “Den I have forgot it.” “The first thing you have to do in the morning, before you get up, is to chop the kindling wood and have it ready the evening before.”

SECRET WRITING. We desire to say to our citizens, that for years we have been selling Dr. King's New Discovery for Constipation, Dr. King's New Life Pills, Bucklen's Arnica Salve and Electric Bitters, and have never handled remedies that sell as well, or that have given such universal satisfaction. We do not hesitate to guarantee them every time, and stand ready to refund the purchase price, if satisfactory results do not follow their use. These remedies have won their great reputation purely on their merits. T. D. Thomas, Proprietor.

—“See here, my friend,” said a farmer to a tramp, “you've been laying in the shade of that fence for over thirteen hours. Ain't it about time to move on?” “If you say so,” replied the tramp, struggling to his feet, “I suppose it is; I'm only trying to make my shoes last as long as possible!”

—“Yes, I will have to discharge you, Ellen. You have a bad temper, you shirk your work, you are too fond of my gloves and perfume, and altogether you are the worst servant I have had since I have been married.” “But you will give me a good reference, ma'am?” “Oh, certainly! hand me that pen!”

—“George, don't!” exclaimed she, “you are altogether too much like an Antrichian Coal Train! Think so, my dear?” “Yes, the nearer the winter season draws nigh the lighter you squawk!”
