CUT OFF. A small steam launch, containing half a dozen persons, swept swiftly along with the muddy current of the Guajara river. The vessel and party had left the Madera, there taking a southerly course as far as Balsamaco. After leaving the latter town they had turned into a side stream and before long were inextricably mixed up in the network of creeks and small rivers which cross and recross themselves in southern

The leader of the party and owner of the launch lay stretched out on the deck with a small rifle in his hands, occasionally shooting at some bright plumaged bird-flying overhead or at a lazy reptile coiled in the branches of a tree on shore.
"Jack," he said presently, to the young man who sat in the pilot house and with rare skill kept the vessel clear of the innumerable logs in the river, "where are

"I don't know," replied Jack. "Where is Bunco? He's the only person who has ever been known to leave these parts

A shout from the young pilot brought Bunco into view—a tall, thin, swarthy man, with a countenance that would have made his fortune as the leading willain in a drama of the lurid type. But in spite of his looks and chronic indisposition to work he was good natured Bunco, as the name most closely resembling that which he had given at their first meeting.

Jack turned the vessel towards shore and rang the signal in the engine room to shut off steam. In a few minutes they had reached dry land and were hurrying in the direction at once. Under cover of the darkness of the building, leaving Bill to moor the launch and follow them later. The party consisted of an English gentleman named Robert Etynge, his two sons, George and Russell; Jack Camp-bell, a young American, and Bill and Bunco, engineer, fireman, deck hand and steward, in turn. They were on a six months' pleasure trip through South The house, which they discovered in the center of a cleared space of ground near the river side, was a well built structure, containing one large and one small Brandy is the national drink, and it cannot be sold in a quantity less than two be a slone book was uncovered. Seized the captain's small repeating ride and cautiously approached the window.

For some minutes the arrows from the natives' air guns flew so thickly that he was unable to get a shot at them; but presently there came a bull in the one sided bombardment, and the sharp crack of the rifle was followed by a death yell

But one rifle, although it kept back for some time the assault of the savages, was not sufficient to drive them away, and late in the afternoon, Jack's car tridges having given out, the natives approached nearer to the cabin.

They seemed to realize that the deadly ammunition of their enemies had become exhausted, and were preparing for a hand to hand conflict, knowing that they outnumbered the inmates of the cabin ten to une. But as they cautiously approached the hut, shooting almost constantly at the door and windows, an unexpected but powerful re-enforcement came to the aid of the tourists in the shape of their en-Para, at the mouth of a branch of the gineer on board the launch. Amazon, nearly a month before, and Bill was slow to comprehend the real had steamed up as far as the junction of danger of his friends' position; but when he did so he at once made preparations for their relief. He gathered all the amunition he could find into the pflot house, and loaded nearly a dozen repeating rifles before commencing to shoot. When he finally opened fire he was able to keep a steady stream of bullets trained upon the savages, and this thoroughly demoralized them and caused the majority to retreat precipitately from the hut and turn their attention toward the river. Bill was not particularly noted for his marksmanship, and not more than one in every twenty bullets took effect; but the unceasing fire was too much for the natives, and they broke and ran like so many sheep.

For a few minutes it looked as though Bill's plan would enable those imprisoned in the but to make their escape; but with the cessation of the firing the courage of the natives returned, and they speedily placed the cabin between themselves and the vessel. Then they sent a half dozen particularly good shots at the doughty "It looks ter me," said Bill to himself, as several of the sharp pointed sticks flew past him, "as if we'd kinder got inter a hornets' nest. These durned savages will starve the boys out unless I can drive them off. I guess I'll wait till after and intelligent, and of valuable service drive them off. I guess I'll wait till after to the party. Jack had christened him dark and see if I can't carry some rifles For some time afterwards the mind of the engineer was busily engaged in choosing from a number of plans the one best suited for the speedy deliverance of his fellow tourists. It would be necessary to fellow tourists. Are you all ready?" "Yes," came in chorus from the rest. and the door was slowly opened.

The captain went out first, followed in urn at intervals of a minute by Bunco, Jack, Russell, Bill and George, Just as the latter started, the fun began The rifles kept cracking merrily, each
