THE RAIN HAIR.

When out of doors is full of rain, I look out through the window pane, And see the droplets on the pane Like people dancing to the breeze.

They bow politely, cross and nod, Salute their partners and retreat, And never stop to rest until They reach the end of the quadrille.

I listen and I hear the sound Of music floating all around, And wonder how the breeze who plays Upon his harp on stormy days.

The strings are made of rain, and when The branches waltz to dance again They waltz like couples—very smart— He always hides away the harp.

A NAME FOR A BOOK.

In the latter years of the third empire—a name that is enough well it lasted—among the many privileged purveyors of gossip to the Parisian daily and weekly press one of the most indefatigable in unearthing the latest titbit of contemporary news was Jules Leventon.

Low-church in style than Henri de Pene, less humorous than Auguste Villonnet, he was nevertheless mainly instrumental in promoting the circulation of the journal to which he was attached by his happy choice of subject matter and general reliability of information.

One day he received a letter from an anonymous correspondent, beginning with the usual complimentary phrase, "You who know everything," and terminating by a rather pungent query: "Why did M. Alphonse Karr select for a volume of tales published some twenty years ago the incomprehensible title of 'Vendredi Soir'?"

"No," he had the idea of my friend, the writer, whoever he may be," said Leventon, with a chuckle of satisfaction, "to apply to me, as I happen to be the only person able to answer the question. I may as well gratify him, particularly the hours and the book are pretty well used up, and a retrospective article for once in a way will be a novelty."

Not having the paper by me, and compelled therefore to trust to my memory, I can only attempt to reproduce the substance of the lively chronicle's most amusing feuilletons, related somewhat in the following terms:

A good many years ago, when I first essayed to gain a living by my pen, Alphonse Karr, if not well known, was regarded as one of the most prominent young authors of the day. He then occupied a tiny apartment on the top floor—the seventh—of a house in the Rue Vivienne, where I occasionally found him, with a book in his hand, and frequent occurrences, alas! at that period of my career—I had nothing better to do. One afternoon, after clambering up his interminable staircase, I found him, contrary to his wont, sitting in a dejected attitude at his window and looking the picture of misery.

"What is the matter?" I inquired. "Anything wrong?" "Everything," he replied, drumming his knuckles impatiently on the window pane. "I have lost 300 francs today, and no funds to meet it."

"Diab!" (It must be understood that in Louis Philippe's reign, to a literary man, 300 francs represented a fabulous sum.) "Not a sou!" he continued, "and that isn't all! Tuesday is the last day of the carnival, and I have promised a pretty neighbor of mine to escort her to the Bois de Boulogne, which of course entails champagne."

"And champagne," I suggested. "Exactly, and where on earth am I to find the money?" "This was a poser, and for some minutes he looked despondently at me.

Suddenly an idea struck me. "Why not ask your publisher," said I, "to advance it to you?" "No use," he muttered, with a melancholy shake of the head. "I am in his debt already."

"If he won't," I persisted, "other way, now, I come to think of it, why not collect those tales and sketches you have written for the 'Lectures' reviews? They ought to make a volume."

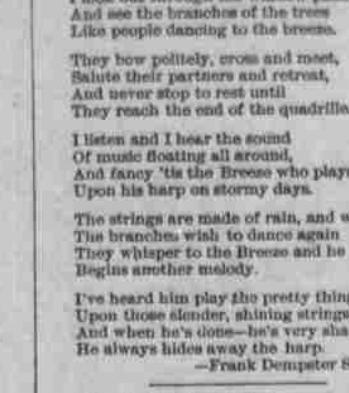

"Yes," said Karr, "with a delinquent, a preface, plenty of margin and an index, perhaps they might."

"Very well, then. Put on your hat and come with me to the publisher's."

"Your publisher? You don't mean to say there is any chance of his taking it?" "Why shouldn't he?" I replied. "He will be only too glad to have your name in his catalogue. At all events, there is no harm in trying."

The establishment of M. Hippolyte Souverain, the fashionable publisher of the period in question, was in the Rue des Beaux-Arts, and on our arrival there we were directed by one of the clerks to a room at the back of the house, where the great man was in the habit of dining. He had nearly finished his repast and shook hands cordially with me as I introduced my companion. I thought it best to sit at the table, and he explained as briefly as possible the object of our coming.
