THE HAUNTED HOUSE.

In the fall of 1886 I was living in Philadelphia, occupying bachelor's quarters, but congratulating myself upon the fact that my boarding-house existence would soon be changed into living in a home. The partner of my joys, who was to occupy that home in the city of Penna., whom I had never seen to describe, as she is now looking over my shoulder at the lines I am writing.

"I were to be married the day after Christmas, and the wedding was to be a double one, for my old friend, Fred Doolittle, was to marry the sister by Mr. Ellis."

"Where was the home to be located? This was the question I was trying to answer at the time of which I am writing. I had not yet decided. I wanted the home to be one home by title as well as by occupancy. I had a few thousands of dollars, but not good enough to buy in the city in that neighborhood. We—that is, Ellis and I—had talked the matter over and concluded we could be very happy in a modest home with a couple of acres of ground attached, and not more than an hour's ride by cars from the city. Every day for several weeks I looked out upon the city in the distance, and I read the descriptions of the new place, and the head of "Real Estate for Sale," but saw nothing I thought would suit us, until one Friday I read a glowing description of the Ledger and was wanted—only the house was larger than necessary—and I was greatly surprised at its cheapness. The advertisement referred to further particulars to Mr. Small, on Walnut street, near Fourth."

"I at once went to Mr. Small's office, and he told me that he had only a few minutes before I called. I made my business known to a tall clerk in charge, who seemed to smile when I asked for the house, and he said, 'I am very sorry, but Mr. Small has gone out to show a house to a customer, and the keys to the house you wanted are in the bunch with the ones he has taken.'"

"I want to see the house to-day if possible," I answered. "A train will start in an hour, and I would like to see it at once.""

"If you are very anxious," replied the clerk with a very apparent grin, "I think you can get the back-door key from the man who lives out Arch street, almost on your way to the station."

"I got the owner's name and address, and entering the first passing car, rode out to Twentieth street, and then walked three squares to Arch, and ringing the bell at the proper number, a handsome-looking man, who was the owner of the house soon entered. When I stated my business, he smiled as the clerk had done, and asked, 'Do you think you would like the house?'"

"If it is according to the description, I think I will," I answered.

"Have you heard anything about it?'"

"Nothing but what the paper says," he said, "and tell you the house has the most beautiful garden."

"I didn't like the idea of living in a haunted house, for I wanted to enjoy my wife's society without phantoms interfering with it. He looked at me in a queer way, and accounted for all the so-called manifestations as the theory of simple mental action on the part of the mind. He said, 'But, thinking it would be as well to show the house, I will take you to it. I don't believe it.'"

"All right," said the gentleman, "here are the keys. You may go and sleep a night or two in the house if you wish, and we will be ready to take you to it on the next train. Why should you fear ghosts? There were no such things, and I felt it was a match for any one who might attempt to frighten me. In fact, I rather enjoyed myself in my phantoms, and I was considered as brave as the ordinary man."

"As some preparation was necessary, I took a little table, with pen, ink and paper, towards him, and after some deliberation, wrote the following lines:

"My Own Mary: For I must call you so once more, though for the last time when we parted last night I was a rich and prosperous man, to-day I am a poor and wretched man. I have nothing in the world that I can call my own."

"Under these circumstances, there is no other course, lets me to you, and that is to give you up. I will know that you could not share a life of poverty and toil—indeed, I would rather die than live in such a way. I will write these words, and you more than I can express, more perhaps than you will ever comprehend. But now, my own Mary, I will give you up, and why dwell on thoughts like these? My brief engagement is at an end, but you will still permit me—will you not—to take a little memory of me, and to give you a part of my life, which I have lived in the most beautiful dream, which shed over my life a halo of the purest happiness I have ever enjoyed."

"Farewell, bless you, my lost love! May you be happy in whatever path of life you are called to walk, in the fervent, heartfelt prayer of one who can now only sign himself your friend."

"James read this note over, and was not satisfied with it; it seemed too flowery, too elaborate. He had meant to be calm and concise, seeing his own feelings in the background, instead of obtruding them selfishly upon her. But as it was written he would not change it. He folded it in a pocket, and a second attempt would probably be worse than the first. So he carried it to the nearest letter-box, and dropped it in. He had been burying a friend, and then returned home to indulge in leisure in his melancholy reflections, for he was now only sign himself your friend."

"How changed everything seemed! All that had been a bright and beautiful dream, which shed over my life a halo of the purest happiness I have ever enjoyed."

"I had read blank was around him, a weight on his heart, but he had not thought it could be lifted again! All was dark where it had been sunshine a few hours before. A few hours! It seemed as though years had elapsed since last night."

"How little had he thought, as he lingered with Mary in the moonlight porch, to say his reluctant good night, that it was for the last time that those little hands would never be placed confidingly in his; that gentle voice murmur his name, giving to the sweetest sound it has ever borne on mortal lips, no more!"

"How floating had been his dream of happiness and love! How dreary and tasteless seemed his life when robbed of its grace and glory!"

"The weary morning wore away, and the hour of noon rang out from the steeples close by. He rose impatiently from the sofa, rang for coffee and some dry toast, but could not taste them when they came. He had eaten no breakfast, and felt faint and weary from excitement and fatigue, but loathed the sight of food."

"His landlady, a kind-hearted elderly woman, quite compassionate in his favored and haggard appearance."

"Dear Mr. Morley, but you do look badly," she exclaimed. "You had better see a doctor."

"James smiled faintly, and assured her that it was only a nervous headache, which would wear off after a while."

"He was, indeed, suffering from extreme nervousness, his pulse throbbing and his blood coursed through his veins with painful rapidity. He tried to compose himself to sleep, but the attempt was vain."

"Late in the afternoon, as he was sitting in an arm-chair near the window, he heard the sound of footsteps on the stairs leading to his room."

"Nobody coming to see me, I determined to go to bed. I had just opened the door, and with a beating face observed—"

"A white lady in a blue silk dress and hat with a most bewitching smile, who, without the least show of bashfulness or timidity, ran up to him and clasped her arms about his neck."

"Oh, James, how could you—how could you write me such a note? I'll never—never forgive you!"

"She was sobbing on his shoulder."

"Mary, my love, my darling girl! what is this? What does it mean?" said James, bewildered to comprehend how this state of affairs could possibly have come about.

"It means this: That you are a bad, bad, good-for-nothing person, who wants to get rid of me, and I won't be got rid of—do you hear? Now do you understand, ungrateful man?"

"No, I don't understand, Mary. I am afraid there is some great mistake."

"Yes, there is a great mistake—the greatest you ever made in your life. I dare say it was my own fault! (sob.)"

"I made you think me a mean, selfish, heartless fellow, who would never love you, and it was shameful in you to believe me, and I never thought you would have acted so! (sob, sob,)" but I will show you that I am just as true and forgiving as I can be, and I've a great mind never to forgive you or love you any more!"

"With which very lucid and consistent speech Miss Sweet hid her face and cried more than ever."

"But, Mary, my dear, dear girl! do you mean to ruin me?"

"Of course, I know it! Papa knows it, see papa, there you didn't think I would be so improper as to come to a gentleman's rooms without my hat, did you, sir? and he says it's all the same!"

"Pardon me, my dear Mary," blandly interposed Mr. Sweet, of whose presence James had been in total unconsciousness; "that was by no means my expression. I only said—"

"What he said, and what James said in return, is too long to be repeated here. Suffice it to say, that James, in the strength of his reason, and the force of his own feelings, was not to be deterred by her, and he went on to make a dozen new fortunes; but as one will be sufficient for his needs, let us hope that it will be long before he succeeds in attaining it."

"He is already on the road to renewed prosperity. He has been married for over a year, and is now the city clerk there, and a happier couple than Mr. and Mrs. James Morley."

"Mary was not to be done."

A Happy Woman.

One of the most successful women in society is the woman who absolutely knows nothing—that is, in the ordinary acceptance of the term—whose nature is so nicely adapted to the needs and requirements of this life that she makes no blunders, and hurts none, (after forming her mind, and in a matter for us to reflect upon, and it should incite us to help our children to cultivate that spirit of kindness which will never hurt any one, and will be of use to all, if not to prefer to do so. We might teach our daughters to listen patiently to the praise of others, and to be content with the least of their charms. Those happy women who are capable of honest and hearty admiration of persons of their own sex are always loved, and are admired and loved, though without accomplishments or graces save this one: taking in and exhaling the air in quiet succession."

A Good Business Deal.

"Farmer's Wife—Couldn't you sell the potatoes, Niram?"

"Farmer—Naw! the grocers said they won't do for nothing."

"Farmer's Wife—Well, I wouldn't be 'brotten' on home when you've the advice of your paper.—[Judge.]"

The Successful Man, as a rule, is the right thing at the right time, and the trick is not one which comes from habit, but from trained habit and thought."

"A man can no more be a Christian without facing evil and conquering it than he can be a soldier without going to battle, facing the cannon's mouth, and encountering the enemy in the field.—[Chapin.]"

Gunpowder was invented so long ago

that its origin is lost in obscurity. It is, however, supposed to have originated in China some centuries before the Christian era. The making of fire pills vessels, and their use as receptacles for gunpowder, has been going on for a long time, and you have powder works blown up and down the country, scattered broadcast, because a soldering iron is used to seal cases of gunpowder. It is seen that science and invention ought long since to have obtained all the danger of such explosions from such a source."

HEINZ'S CONDENSED TOMATOES.

It is an Art to Obtain Rapidly and Wisely the Contents of a Book.

All books need to be read carefully; indeed, it is often a waste of time to linger long over a volume whose entire thought is not essential to one's purpose. It is an art acquired only by practice to gain swiftly and rapidly from a somewhat heavy yet occasional fruit, the most book. Many, probably most, volumes demand time and careful thought. The second reading of a good book is often of great value. The thoughts related from the first reading are impressed more fully in the mind, and become assimilated with one's mental structure, while others of value that were unnoticed before are gathered in."

"If there is no time for a second reading, it is an excellent idea to read with a blue pencil in hand, and to mark those passages on which one would like to dwell further thought. In the eyes of some people, marking a book is an unpardonable sin, but the practice has many advantages. The objection that a book whose margins are interlined looks so clean and fresh that it is free from markings has no weight. Of what value is a shelf full of books that have been rightly kept from those who write, and who are to be read as if just from the publisher, except to command a higher price, when some years hence our cherished possessions are taken to a dealer in second hand literature."

"A judiciously marked book is a source of delight to the reader and his friends, and becomes a more powerful part of the reader's thought than any other."

"Read with a friend if possible; not necessarily aloud or together, but if the thoughts of two friends are directed to the same course of reading during the day, its subjects are pretty sure to be discussed and its substance more thoroughly digested and assimilated. Quoted after an allusion to the book or a quoted passage recalls the thoughts and affords both profitably and pleasantly. Discussion always emphasizes and greatly facilitates comprehension of a written paper.—[Harper's Bazar.]"

The African Pygmies.

The name of dwarfs, applied by some to these people, has been objected to as implying deformity or arrested growth, and therefore conveying a wrong impression. Neither of the kind can be said of the African pygmies, who, though of short stature, are well shaped people of perfectly normal formation. It is true that the Hottentots and Bushmen show certain strange anatomical peculiarities; but these may be said to be more or less accidental, being, in part, at least, the result of special and unfavorable conditions of life.

The pygmies are nomadic in their habits, and neither keep cattle nor till the ground, but live by hunting and snaring wild animals and birds, or under the most unfavorable circumstances on wild fruits, roots, and berries. Their weapons are always bows and arrows, the latter usually poisoned with the juice of a certain tree. They have no fixed abode, and, if they build huts at all, only construct rude huts of branches. They have no government, nor do they form regular communities. They usually wander about like our nomads, but live in the company of few families each. This, however, depends on the nature of the country—in the parched deserts of the south they are not even united to this extent. Sometimes they are to be seen in small parties of three or four, who, who afford them protection in return for certain services. Their notions of the Unseen, when they have any, would appear to be of the very crudest. Their language seems to be distant from others, and very peculiar.—[Popular Science Monthly.]"
