UNCLE JOB'S PLAN.

Uncle Job Forester was like a great any other American parents—he had

harry ary woman in the not but what they's plenty good o' better, but they have other plans an' projec'a!"

A pretty school teacher hearded at the Forester's, and it was her apparently in-tocent self that was making all the trouble. Lew Forster, the younger of the boys, was hopelessly in love with her, and as he was young, with his life's work accurely mapped out, and as May Derning was poor, with an abundance of poo relatives, the marriage was deemed highly inexpedient. Uncle Job ruminated upon the subject as he followed his lary, fat team along the corn rows.

"Some to me," he soliloquized, "of I'd jes' speak to her father—drat the weeds! I do wish I'd a check rowed this! The cocklaburn is a goin' to jee' plum teeto-tally take hit—he'd stop hit, being so poor an high minded. But like's not Lew'd git mad at my interfering, an marry her anyhow, jee' to teach me a lesson, an'not a simin' to marry her at all, before. I've knowed parents to put they foot in it mightly afore this, an' I've often wonmightily afore this, an' I've often wondered if Mahaly Ann Briggs would a ben
a better chance than Mary Ann, though I wouldn't have nuther one of 'em a sposin' that I ricieck anything about their times. No, I reckin I'd better not call on her pap for any help, seeing as I spilt his prospec's in our young days. Oh, you git up there, you lazy helfer! Looks like the more you feed on' the lazier they git! No, but ef I can't hatch up something 'thout showin' my hand, why, I'll jes' let 'em marry for bein' a fool."

"If I was him I wouldn't drive no gig," Lew remarked, uttering the words before reflecting upon what wight follow.

"I ain't agoin' to," Dan answered, with the confidence of a young man who owns a good team of his own. "I'm agoin' to drive Stell and Grace—the buggy needs a little fixin' up."

Lew hitched up his team and went to work. He despaired of having a chat with May so early in the morning, but

"See here, Dan'l," Uncle Job began, as soon as Lew was out of earshot, "anybody can see that Lew is soft on the teacher, and the ijit will marry her of he night an bring the whole family." teacher, and the ijit will marry her of he ain't stopped; not but what she's planty good enough for him, an' too good, as to that, but you know we've aline had other plans for Lew. I never saw sich a hard hearted creetur as he is. He can cut an' slash on live animals, an' I think he'd make a good doctor. That's what mean' your maw wants, an' of course, of he marries the school teacher he can't never he nothing but a farmer, for you know he can't more'n write his name now, though "You'll see, paw," Mrs. Forester accurate for the propersion of the first lays."
