Each desk to be put in connection has its own instrument, which is in principle the same thing as the full grown telephone, but is of miniature size. The receiving or hand instrument, however, is not of the long shaps with cylindrical bandle, familiar everywhere newadays, but is simply a flat disk recembling one of the earliest forms of telephone, of which a few were seen in the infancy of the invention. The "central office" is put in a small but the vessel was lost. So they took in closed or inclosure at some convenient point, and is operated by a boy who has nothing else to do.

There are a dozen or so connections, according to the size of the installation and the needs of the office. This exchange is operated upon precisely the same principle, though of course on a smaller scale and with isoscomplication, as a central office in a city exchange. The ring of any of the connected telephones causes a numbered disk on a switchboard to fall when the boy makes the desired connection and releases it when the talk is finished. In large and busy establishments, where every department must be connected with every other for frequent communication, this belephous exchange system does away with a large number of cumbrons speaking tibes and incures a quicker and more satisfactory service.—New York Tribune.

Well, a Boston actress crossed on the steamer with the man mentioned above sailing from East Boston in the early sailing from East Hoston in the early summer. She sat at the captain's table, find was so pretty as to attract the admiring attention of every one on board. The fact had its penalties. She was in lasty health, and her appetite reflected the bracing effects of the sea air on her fine physique. At every meal she called for every dish on the bill of fare. The cook must have felt homored, but it kept the steward jumping. He took more steps for her sweet pleasure than for all the rest of his contingent. He did his duty well.
