KEEP THE PREMISES CLEAN.

Every cultivator should keep his premises as clean as possible, for the important purpose of saving manure and promoting health.

Keep the premises, particularly around the dwelling, perfectly free from every substance that will taint the air.

The pig pen, though at a respectable distance, should be supplied with loam to absorb all liquid manure.

Cellars should be made as clean as possible, particularly as they communicate directly with the dwelling above.

Ground plaster and freshly burnt charcoal, set in vessels or strewed around in cellars, or other places where foul air exists, or is liable to be produced, has a very beneficial effect.

Necessaries often produce a foul atmosphere around them and in the dwelling is near, the offensive air is often wafted to it, and even when not perceptible, it is often operating injuriously.

Water from the tank should be absorbed in loam, &c., for manure, instead of being in foul gases, and being blown into the houses.

Decaying weeds, grass, potatoes affected with the rot, potato tops, pumpkins and other vines, and various productions, are undergoing decomposition in the field and to the aggregate the amount is large, and filling the air with pestiferous gases.
