GOOD ROADS.

The importance of good roads, especially in a country like ours, deserves more thought and pains-taking than is generally conceded to it. Every American that visits Europe is struck with the difference; though his native land is disparaged by the contrast, he is scarce satisfied with the exin its infancy. This indeed is true, but it cannot wholly be admitted as an apology.

We are too reckless, too negligent consequently.

For all four of the Reviews, For Blackwood's Magaz ne, For Blackwood and three Reviews, For Blackwood and the four Reviews, Expansion to be made in all cases. We are too reckless, too negligent, and consequently too unscientific. And in a letter to the editor of the Tribune, a farmer in Pennsylvania thus gives valuable hints as to the science of road making:

"Recollect, farmers and teamsters, that on an inclined plane rising only one foot in twenty-four, which is a very gentle hill, a horse can pull only one-half the load that he can on a level; and that on an inclined doing as much as four can on hills to be met with in every undulating country. If more on the subject.

"Now, by the employment of a very place of the fearful hills, a most admirable line could be obtained. Indeed, so glaring are the faults in choice of ground, that I can only suppose they are frequently committed on purpose, in order to lessen the weight that a team could draw over a road that charges toll. In the older States, I A Benevo'ent Institution, established by special endousmen fear the chance of improving the location of the existing roads is small, as, where the land is valuable, and many interests involved in it, the owners are much averse to changing lines of road, notwithstanding they would be gainers in the long run, by so doing; but it cannot be too often repeated to those inhabiting new States, and who have still the power to make a choice in the matter, to secure a good location for your roads at first. Never mind the condition of the surface for the present; according as land becomes more valuable around the newly laid out road, people will see the necessity of putting a good, firm material on it—that will be only a matter of time; but if the laying out be faulty in the first instance, it is seldom remedied afterwards. Of course, it would be far better to have the road constructed on correct principles at first; but this might be expecting too much. On a good broken stone road, a horse can pull three times as much as he can on ordinary rough ones. Take this in connection with the fact about the loss of power in ascending hills, and you can form some idea of the relative value of good and bad roads. To sum up all, a good road is cheap at almost any price, while a bad one is dear, even if it could be had for nothing."

Mr. Joseph E. Hoover:—A trial of your Liquid Hair

it has in several instances proved serviceable in the cure
