TALES & SKETCHES

HERBERT AND I.

We had quarreled, Herbert and I, or, rather we were es ranged-and yet we loved each other better than the life God had given us.

The rest of the household had gone to a concert, and I sat by the library-fire, lonely and despairing.

After all, it is a very bitter thing to quarrel with the one we love best on all the earth. I went to the window, and hiding myself behind the heavy curtain, I looked out on the busy streets. All outside was dreary. The wind was jubilant, the sky was gray, and the moonlight cold er than all.

Within, all was tropical warmth and luxury. Broad waves of crimson flooded the library floor, from the bright authracite coal burning in the open grate. I thought only I and the servants had been left at home. What, then, was my sur-prise to see Herbert enter?

He came so noiselessly in his slippered feet, that I never heard him till the door opened.

He looked pale and sad, and the broad white brow, and dark, mournful eyes had lost their usual calm expression. I noticed how wearily he sank down in the great chair, and how his fine mouth was compressed as though in pain; it set me to thinking. I remembered how long and well he had loved me, and a fierce pang tore my heart as I thought how well I loved him

Was it not going to cost more than it would come to-this lover's quarrel? I longed to put my arms round his neck and tell him so, but I was too proud. I knew he was going away to morrow, and I knew the fault of our estrangement was all mine. Would I see him go and make no sign? Could I? Would I?

He bowed his head upon his hands and moaned. It thrilled me through and through; but the ugly little devil tugging at my heart kept saying, 'Don't humble yourself to any man,' while my guardian angel, looking over my shoulder grew sad, and said :

'Let not the sun go down upon your wrath.'

Already ten suns had set since I had ar rayed myself against Herbert. I was distracted between the angel and the demon In all his life Herbert Graham had loved only me; at least he had told me so, and I believed him. You had but to look at his calm, truthful eyes to feel that a lie had never sullied his pure soul; besides Herbert was one of the humblest of God's servants.

By and by he lighted the gas, and went to writing letters; but the sadness of his face did not abate one whit. He wrote rapidly for an hour and a half, during which time I wrestled with my stormy soul, listening alternately to the angel and the demon.

L have thought since, that night was the turning-point in my life; I thought of the future, which might be so bright, or so dreary, just as I willed it. I thought how Herbert had built up all his hopes on the future we were to share together.

Only a fortnight ago he had drawn me a Claude-like picture of the dream he was in the habit of dreaming, under the sunshine, with eyes open wide.

'A home darling, where the orphan, Herbert Graham, will be lonely no more. A home at last where the tripping of wo-it; for he knew the repentance must be very deep that would bring my proud soul to his feet.

I will not tell you what the error was, enough that Herbert has forgiven me, and my life is once again rich with immeasura ble hope, and each day's sun rises and sets upon a home where discord never enters, for the white winged angel of peace spread her wings over it, when we came to dwell here, and we have lived under their shadow ever since

I read of an astrangement to day, that end. ed less happily than ours-death to one. and a life-long remorse to the other-be cause the one in fault was too proud to acknowledge she had erred. Living with Herbert, I have come to understand the full meaning of the word 'proud.' It is not a 'spunky' holding out against another; it is not being 'highst ung, or 'independent.' It is being too proud to do a wrong action, too proud to 'hold on' to our opinion, or to yield to our own feelings, when we know that another is right; too proud to have our own heart condemn us secretly, to oppose the weak, or break any law, human or divine. It is when one is estranged from one's lover, being too proud to let our temper gain the victory over our heart and judgment, so that we cannot see clearly where the right

At any rate, if one loves a man it is not so very hard a thing to yield to his reasonable wishes; and then to yield is oftenest right, and always graceful and womanly.

man's feet, and the sound of woman's voice, will sound like music! A home where a sweet wife will sit by the fireside that has been so lonely-a small woman, with flowing robes and soft falling hair; without ornament, only a narrow strip of rich lace around the white throat and dainty wrists; a woman that will fill every nook and corner of the pastor's home and heart.'

This he had said, with his fine face aglow only a little time before, and now it was all over. The home would never be, and the woman who was to bring all his joy had been tried and found wanting !

I sank upon my knees, under shadow of the window curtains, and carried my desolate heart to God. The face of the angel was very near to me then, and I would not listen to the demon harping :

'Do not yield; if you yield to him now you will always have to; it's just as you begin.'

I wept and prayed alternately, and thought of the past.

Then, forgetting to pray, my spirit looked down through the amber and gold of the years to where a youth and maid an stood by a new made grave and pledged their faith; and later, how the same youth and maiden stood betrothed lovers, with my parents' sanction, and God's blessing; full of glad young life; rich with immeasurable hope! and now-I despairing and Herbert full of anguish, but bowing meek ly, because he was a servant of the Most High, and knew this trial was God-appointed.

Herbert finished the papers and once more sat down by the fire.

Last Sabbath he had preached his first sermon as an ordained minister of God; preached it with this sorrow I had caused him tugging at his heart.

I thought of his loneliness; how he had lived in his father's old home, with only a man-servant, for seven long years; and how now, being charged to fill his father's place, he would return alone to the old place, and the old loneliness. The clock struck eleven. I knew they would soon be home, my aunt and cousins; so, listening only to the angel, I stole out from my hiding place, and kneeling down beside Herbert, laid my head on his knee. I had no words to offer, only my tears; and he, that brave, strong soul, that never knew weakness himself, accepted my mute prayer for forgiveness.
