Little Things.

We propose, in this article, to dwell briefly on the influence that little things have, particularly in the school room. We do not intend to delight our readers with any beautiful fancy picture painted in the glowing colors which our good English is capable of doing for the imagination when in competent hands, nor do we wish to distract the mind by inviting it into any labyrinth of logic; but we wish simply to say a few common things.

We have scarcely ever heard the subject of influence treated of but that the illustration of the pebble dropped into the brook has been given; and we hope it may never be laid aside until mankind are led to see how strikingly alike are the influences of our acts and the continuous waves produced by the dropping of the pebble. The shores may bound the waves, but eternity alone-and it is boundless-will bound the influence of our actions.

The earth is made of grains of sand: the ocean is made of drops of water, and life is made of acts-each bearing a mighty influence.

It is little things that make up the great sum of life; and it is little things that govern the school room. These, little though they be, are not, nor may not be, things of accident. They are little things that spring from great principles-the principles of justice, truth and right. These should be the basis of school government. Were it not for these principles in civil court, what would property or life be worth? The school-room is the child's world Their little affairs to them are of as great concern as ours are to us chil dren of larger growth. A want of or a laxity in justice in the dealings of the teacher-in whom, in his pupils' eyes, is invested all legislative, executive and judicial powers-creates quite as sad an effect in their case as in ours did our rulers forget to exercise justice, truth and right. We could illustrate but we forbear as our object is school government. We are so constituted that in order to secure peace and harmony-which are most desirable elements in a school-we must have justice. Don't imagine that chil dren are unable to distinguish justice from injustice. Their discernment of right and wrong is so acute that they are able to detect the faintest shade of injustice. Let a teacher practice in justice in its lightest phase, in the most trifling case, and because we hate a dark picture, we close our eyes from tracing its influence. There are many little things that have great influence over a school; but in analyzing them we find that they all spring from the one great root-justice-not stern justice, as it is sometimes termed, but loving, tender, Christ like justice to the child, to the community and to the teacher himself.

We could particularize to an indefinite length, but we leave the subject to the intelligent consideration of ear est teachers. Where there is justice re will be harmony, where there is harmony there is order-baving Heaven's first law the rest will naturally E.
