JUDGE BLACK IN PARIS.

HIS IMPRESSIONS OF THE REPUBLIC.

Amelities of Life in the American Colony—The Frenchman's Forgetfulness of Lafayette—From that Frenchman's Point of View—The Religious Persecutions—The Bread—

Correspondence of the Philadelphia Times.

PARIS, July 24.

When you asked me and I half promised to write you some account of my journey, did you think I would give you geographical descriptions of places, or a history of my personal adventures, or a repetition of private statements made to me or in my presence by public men? I trow not. What then would be the use of such a correspondent? None whatever, and I told you so. If you want current news the cable will promptly convey what is worth having, and the mails go loaded with much more than you care about. For public economy I can refer you with some confidence to Mr. Walker, our consul general, from whom essays and speeches on that and all kindred subjects flow like a fountain unceasingly full. Of diplomacy there is no point so knotty but General Noyes unties it as easily as his garter. On the more important subject of French fashions you can learn all you want from a semi-official source—the wife of the vice consul, who, besides being a very accomplished lady, has the merit of deriving her lineage from Chambersburg.

I have realized the truth of the aphorism expressed by Horace with his untranslatable terseness, that he who crosses the sea may change his climate, but not his nature; and he takes his prejudices along wherever he goes. Mine adhere to me with as much tenacity as if I had stayed at home; and some of them, particularly that one in favor of honest constitutional government, is rather intensified than weakened. There is not much here to gratify the pride which some of our countrymen feel in their institutions. The American colony is not merely respectable it is numerous, rich and talented enough to exercise great social influence; but it is as different as possible from an American colony struggling against the tyranny of George the Third. Nevertheless they are good, as well as gay and festive, and my patriotism was much invigorated by attending their Fourth of July celebration, where we had the most sumptuous of French American dinners, at which our Minister presided with a pride of place becoming the successor of Franklin and Jefferson, mingled with the genial kindness which the heart of Ohio always pours out when it gets a chance to overflow without drowning its party ambition. There also Mr. Foster exposed the mysteries of our diplomacies with a clearness which showed it to be no mystery at all; and General Keys told us in a short address so much of military science and history that our civil employments seemed stale and unprofitable in comparison; and Mr. Walker gave a dissertation on commerce, full of curious facts and abounding in general propositions, some of which were true, and Mr. Eli Sheppard said so many seductive things about money that we could scarcely believe in the root of all evil, General Stanford, of California, made us see at a glance how stupendous was our system of railroads, and what mighty results it was working for us and for all the world. But to my taste the speech of the evening was Governor Hoffman's. Admiral Stanford, of California, made us see at a glance how stupendous was our system of railroads, and what mighty results it was working for us and for all the world. But to my taste the speech of the evening was Governor Hoffman's.

It is not very easy to find memorabilia of that affectionate admiration with which the great men of our revolutionary period once inspired the French heart. They have almost forgotten Jefferson, whose profound philosophy taught them the value of liberty, but from whom they could not learn the dangers of slavery. Franklin's name is consecrated by the almost miraculous eloquence of Marbeau's funeral oration upon him, and his character is permanently woven into the history of his political principles. But the simple purity of the often and elaborately dressed upon, but he had looked through and through it with a learned spirit and handled it with so much force and felicity of diction that "truths divine came mended from that tongue."
