A Great Apple Jack Crop.

More than 75,000 Gallons the Probable Yield this Year in Orange County. This is apple jack year in Orange county N. Y. The apple crop is large every other year. This year the fruit is unusually plenty. Apple jack was first discovered it is said, in New Jersey, and Sussex county was the great distilling place of that beverage. But Orange county, N. Y., long ago took the palm away from Sussex in the matter of making apple jack, and now turns out more of the liquor than any county in the United States. The stills of Orange county will this year yield not less than 75,000 gallons of apple jack. The farmers are gathering their apple crops together already, and the distillers have nmenced operations. The bulk of the apple whisky made in in Orange county is required to supply the local demand. The farmer takes his pay for his apples at the still in the tompered juice of the fruit. He stores his cellar with apple jack with the same care that he stows away potatoes and cabbage for family use. The Orange county farmer who has not a "vial" of the native tipple to produce when visitors call, is considered as lacking in hospitality. Stored away in the cellars of the rural districts are casks of apple jack from which age has removed the Damascene edge, and given it the golden glow and oleaginous body that mark it as the pefect tipple to the taste of the ironclad tillers of the country's soil.

Now and then apple whisky of this character will be offered for sale through the closing up of some estate. Public sales, including the cellars of well known connoisseurs in the product of the country's stills, will draw more representative people as prospective buyers than the sale of any other property that may be advertisep, excepting, perhaps, a stable of Ham-bletonian colts. Whisky of the class named commands from $7 to $10 a gallon under the hammer. This is not the kind the bartender will set out at any of the hostelries of the county. If the man asks for whisky at an Orange county bar, the bartender sets out apple jack. drink little else in the community.

River Transportation. Marine Journal, Cincinnati, Sept. 23. Senator Conkling, in his recent great

peech in New York, took occassion to belittle river transportation, especially in the West and Southwest. Mr. Conkling has evidently only a vague idea of the use of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers-that they are good to wash in and fish in, and possibly good to drink if one can't get champagne, but as highways of trade they are only worthy of his contempt. When he comes to Cincinnati, as he is announced to do shortly, some well-posted river man or shipper ought to give him a lesson in Western river commerce. He might form a different idea of the magnitude and importance of the interests he treats so lightly. Tell him of the two or three million bales of cotton that every year seek a market or factory over the Missi ssippi. Tell him of the many millions of tons of coal, of iron, lumber, and industrial and agricultural products that throb through the great arteries, and carry abounding life to the growing populations of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys. Tell him of the tremendous floods of grain that are poured along these channels of chéap transportation. It might have a wholesome effect on his estimate of the West and her resources. Why, only last week a little tow boat-but one of many similarly engaged, and growing in numbers—went into New Orleans with a tow of 207,000 bushels of grain, or about 5,175 tons. How many cars would it take to move the cargo of that little boat? In round numbers 518 cars and 26 locomotives! Arrangements are now being made for a line in which the tow of each boat will carry 9,000 tons on low water. It would take 900 cars and 45 locomotives to move the cargo of one boat ! The towboat J. R. Williams took down the river a tow of about 650,000 bushels of coal—over 40,000,000 of pounds, or 20,000 tons. It would have taken about 2,000 cars and 100 locomotives to move the cargo! Steamboats with loads of cotton ranging from 1,000 to 8,000 bales, and a proporionate amount of cotton seed and oil cake fairly swarm the lower Mississippi and its tributaries. These are only specimen bricks from the grand commercial structure built
