EATON ON THE TARIFF.
EXPOSING THE SHAM SCARE OF DEMAGOGUES.
The Tariff Question Not One of Partisan Politics—Manufacturers Sold for Eaton Bill Passed by a Democratic Congress—A Responsible Information for Laboring Men and "Business Men."
GARFIELD A FREE TRADER.
His Letter to the Cobden Club Proves It—Mr. Tilden's Active Support of Hancock.

Senator Eaton on the Tariff.
On Friday evening, October 22, Senator Eaton, of Connecticut, delivered the following transcendent speech on the tariff issue.

For forty years an effort had been made to take this great economic question out of politics. If there was a manufacturer present, he would agree in saying that all that was required besides wise and prudent legislation in a tariff was stability. As Dutton had said of revolution "All that is required to make revolution successful is audacity, audacity, audacity." So all that was required by the business men was permanence and stability. The House of Representatives under the constitution, had the sole power of originating bills for revenue. The tariff measure was of the nature of a revenue bill, and he had for years undertaken to have Congress treat the question of the tariff as a business question outside the domain of politics. On the 17th of last December he had the honor to introduce in Congress a bill giving the president of the United States, or that man who draws the salary [great laughter and applause] the power to nominate to the Senate nine men taken from civil life—not congressmen, but men having knowledge of the manifold industries of the people. The bill provided for giving to these nine men all the power of the United States to examine into commerce, mining, and manufactures, and all the varied interests of the people, and to report from time to time to Congress their facts and opinions thereon, and finally to report at large before Dec. 1, 1881. He had made it his business to secure a tariff, and a Republican take the tariff question out of politics. He had been willing to use all the force he could secure in aid of his purpose. He was willing to use Republicans, Green-backers, and even Confederate brigadiers.

He said that the question of the tariff out of politics, and to restore our commercial marine. The bill passed the Senate by a majority of three to one. Another bill was presented by the senator from Arkansas, embodying the same views with the exception that the commission was to be elected by the Senate. Therefore every member of the United States Senate had divorced this question from the line of party politics, and this divorced couple would never be reunited. [Great applause.] A Republican senator said that the man who would try to draw the question into politics again was a demagogue.

Our Republican friends, after the enactment of the tariff, and it is [great applause]—after the African was driven out of the fence—and he is driven out [applause]—in the last few weeks of the canvass have lugged this great economic question into politics. Let us see whether they are honest. Let us see who petitioned to get the tariff out of politics, and who comes here and undertakes to tell us what they want? As Jefferson said: "No man can argue that the sun shines; there is no room for argument." There is no room for argument whether these men who manufacture 1,500,000 bolts of cotton cloth for employment to 500,000 hands. The employed $200,000,000 of capital, and feel 2,500,000 people. That was one petition. Now, I beg to ask whether these men who sent in that petition know what they want?—letter than some of the applicants who come here and undertake to tell us what they want? As Jefferson said: "No man can argue that the sun shines; there is no room for argument." Well, never said he was an honorable member. [Laughter.] I said he was a member, and I suppose they made him an honorary member because they thought he was in accord with them. [Great laughter.]

Gen. Garfield a Free Trader.
His Letter Accepting Membership in the Cobden Club Proves It.
Editor of the Record:
Last September I was traveling in Indiana as an independent spectator of the political contest. I made the acquaintance during those days of many Republican gentlemen. Not a few of them told me that the "British Free Trade Association" in London sent $250,000 to America for the purpose of influencing the election of a Democratic president. I was rather surprised at that statement, and I addressed a letter to one of the most prominent members of the "British Free Trade Association, Cobden Club," on this subject, and this day I have received an answer, an excerpt from which follows:

"COBDEN CLUB, LONDON, S. W., October 12, 1880.—Our club is the only Free Trade Association in Great Britain, and we have no funds for election purposes. It is against our rule to interfere in any political contest, especially out of our country. The rumor of British gold being sent by our association to influence an American election is simply ridiculous, and needs no further comments. I have seen the secretary of the club, who informs me that Mr. James A. Garfield, the Republican candidate for the presidency in America, is a member of our club, and I read Mr. Garfield's letter accepting the membership, in which he expresses himself as a decided 'Free Trader.'"

The above letter should be published to my Republican friends in Indiana that they have been misled by the British Free Traders' association in England to influence the election of the Democratic candidate. I have also heard from many Republicans in this country that Mr. Garfield is not a friend of free trade; but neither do nor his friends will care to deny that the letter referred to above is on file at the Cobden Club rooms. If it is required I am willing to furnish the name of the gentleman who addressed me the above letter.
Yours respectfully,
JAMES BEAT MANTROF,
Editor of "The Free Trader," Edinburgh, Scotland,
PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 24, 1880.
Herbicide Discovers of a Dream.
Three weeks ago Mrs. Mary Mayer, of Jersey City, died of typhoid fever. She was a large, fleshy woman, and when she lay in her coffin there was a remarkably the sewing machine. [Laughter.] He was not frightened. He had not scared worth a cent. [Laughter.] He did not think the election of Hancock and English would prevent the sending of sewing machines to Europe. [Applause.]

[Applause.] It means that this party and its leaders and speakers will descend to every depth of knavery in order to carry the election. I want to use plain words here, that men can understand. I say here it is wickedly knavish. [Applause.] Well, such is the truth about that? The cutting establishment in New Britain, Connecticut, has driven the English out of Canada. [Applause.] It has under-sold Great Britain in South America. [Applause.] It competes with England in the East. It is in the market against this very day the cutting of that British Crown, made in Birmingham and Sheffield right under their very noses. [Applause.] Oh, indeed? They are going to shut up shop, are they? [Laughter.] Going to get mad [laughter], be tomfoolish, and get mad when Hancock is going to make no more money? Oh, fellow citizens, it is dishonorable, it is dishonest to the very core of their rotten hearts, for men to talk in that way. [Applause.]
As I have in my own city a machine shop—one of the largest in the world—the shop of Pratt & Whitney. The head of the establishment is a gentleman, although he is a Republican, strange as it may seem. [Laughter.] He don't understand his business. There are 700 or 800 of them. But his father does, and stockholders do, and tell the men that there won't be any work; that their shops will shut up—the same old story about the porphores if Hancock is elected. What is the fact about that industry? Why this day that establishment is executing orders for the emperor of Germany, for the republic of France, sending its wares across the Atlantic and competing with and beating British manufacturers in markets to reach which the latter has only a little channel of twenty miles to cross. [Applause.] Shut up shop, will they? [This was spoken with peculiar satire, and elicited a roar of laughter.]
Again, there is the great cotton industry of this country. We are so far ahead of our British competitors that they are pirating our trade-marks every day. [Applause.] I say this because, as chairman of the committee on foreign affairs in the Senate, it was my duty to look into this thing. I had this great assurance that England cannot make any of these goods and put them down in London and Liverpool for the same price as we make them. So the Englishmen take the gummed and flimsy starched cotton goods and put the false marks of American mills on them to delude and cheat their own people. [Applause.]
Senator Eaton told a story of how he had exposed the duplicity of one manufacturer before an audience by challenging him to deny that he could make goods and sell them in New York at a price half what he would charge in England and a-half cents a yard. He said that in the face of this exposure the bilious manufacturer was as dumb as an oyster. Yet that man had been telling his workmen that he would have to shut up his shop if Hancock was elected, because the British merchants would come here and undersell him. [Laughter.] The man knew that he was telling a lie. As to the charge that he was a free trader—Senator Eaton said: "Mr. Hawley said in reference to the bill I have told you of, in a large public meeting, that this was the bill of a free trader. Now, Shakespeare says something about a man's writing himself down as a free trader. An American whose goods are worth $2,000,000,000, the interest upon which, together with the expenses of the government, must be paid, would be an ass to suppose that there can be any such thing as free trade. Therefore, not desiring to enter into competition with any Republican, I have declined to become a member of any free trade club." [This allusion to Garfield's membership in the Cobden Club brought down the house.]
Senator Eaton continued: "They say he is only a free trader. Well, never said he was an honorable member. [Laughter.] I said he was a member, and I suppose they made him an honorary member because they thought he was in accord with them. [Great laughter.]" life-like appearance, the cheeks being flushed and colored as in life. Many of the neighbors who saw her said that they could scarcely believe that she was dead. Yesterday a startling rumor was current in the neighborhood. Some of the neighbors say that what does? It means that a married daughter of hers who lives on Bergen Heights, avers that she has been filled with dread that her mother was buried alive. The story is that she said that she had dreadful dreams every night in which she heard her mother calling: "Come and help me, for God's sake! Come and help me!" So terrible did this become that she at last consulted her sister, who lives at her mother's late residence. The neighbors aver that the brothers and sisters were so much impressed with this story that they had their mother's body, which was interred in New York Bay cemetery, exhumed, and to their horror, discovered that she had turned on her face in the coffin, and that in her struggles she had torn one ear almost off. The family deny the story in toto, and are doing their best to hush up the matter; but neighbors who know them well aver that it is true.
