TWO SUDDEN DEATHS. One From Heart Disease—The Other From a Fail.

On Saturday night a young man named Joseph Eierman, aged 22 years, dropped dead in the bar-room of Lucas Fritz's hotel, St. Joseph street. The circumstances, as developed at a coroner's inquest, are substantially as follows: Eierman, who has for some time been affected with heart disease, was at the saloon of Martin Kempf, Poplar street, at an earlier hour in the evening, and while there a quarrel arose between two men named Andrew Gerz and James Eichler, during which the latter drew from his pocket a pistol and threatened to shoot Gerz. Gerz seized the pistol and took it from Eichler, discharged the loads it contained, and put the now harmless weapon into his pocket. Eierman, who was not in any way engaged in the dispute, left Kempf's and walked over to Fritz's which is not far off. Gerz also soon went to Fritz's and was followed by Eichler who demanded the pistol. Gerz refused to give it up, as Eichler was in-toxicated, but told him he would give it to him on Monday or Tuesday. This did not satisfy Eichler and the two men got into another squabble and were soon rolling on the floor. Eierman, who was again an involand almost instantly called for help, saying she believed the man was dying. In an instant he was dead. Coroner Mishler was summoned and after midnight held an inquest, Dr. J. A. Fitzpatrick acting as coroner's physician, and the following named men composing the jury: John Snyder, George Kolb, jr., Leonard Pickel, James Kautz, Philip Leder, jr., and Joseph Ortlieb.

The jury viewed the body, and the statement as above given was testified to, substantially, by the witnesses, and it was also in evidence that deceased was a sufferer from heart disease. Without rendering a verdict the jury adjourned until o'clock this morning, when they reassembled and rendered a verdict of death from heart disease, brought on by excitement.

The body of Mr. Eierman was taken to the residence of his father on Love Lane, near Manor street, immediately after it had been viewed by the coroner. Deceased was a sober, peaceable, upright young man, a tanner by trade, and so industrious that he often worked from 15 to 20 hours a day. He was the sole support of an aged father and a young sister, and there is much sympathy felt for them on account of the peculiarly sad circumstances attending his death, which was caused undoubtedly by excitement brought on by seeing two other men engaged in a quarrel in which he had no part. was of the "choke" variety. Instead of a pole-cat coming after the bait a crow put in his appearance and seemed to partially understand the "dodge." Instead of pick-ing out the bait with his bill he reached one of his claws after it. The trap worked beautifully, and the claw of the crow was caught between its iron jaws. Pretty soon a hawk made its appearance at the trap, but whether to fight the crow or get the bait, no one can tell. However, when a neighbor of the noted trapper came upon the scene he found that the crow had one claw caught in the trap, while with the other he was holding the hawk to the ground at the neck.

Minstrel Show at Marietta. On Saturday Dailey's minstrels visited Marietta, where they gave an entertainment in the evening to a house which was a good one and it greatly pleased the audience. Harry Gallagher, who has made for himself a reputation as being a "queer" man, was the manager of the show. When the effectainment was about half over he went to the box office, and by drawing a knife and threatening to kill George Goodhart, he succeeded in getting the proceeds of the evening. He paid off the hall rent, license, newspaper bills, and the cost of the sleighs which took the troupe to Marietta. He then told the go home Gallagher was not about and the proprietor of the hotel stated that he had not been paid for the supper of the showmen. A search was made for Gallagher but when found he said he had no money, he having either spent or concealed about $20, with which he should have paid the bills. An arrangement was then made with the hotel preprietor by which his bill will be paid, and the troupe was enabled to leave for this city, where they arrived early yesterday morning. Every member of the show behaved in an orderly manner except Gallagher, who got drunk and made a great deal of noise besides cheating the other the profits.
