FATAL ACCIDENT.

Killed in a Pit by Falling Earth. Frederick Kahl, a foreman in the employ of Urban & Berger, was fatally last night killed by being struck by a mass of falling earth in the property on South Queen street, known as "Springer's vault," now belonging to Urban & Berger. The circumstances are as follows: Messrs. Urban & Berger were erecting dwelling houses on the site of the vaults and had a force of men at work removing some nine or ten feet of earth with which the top of the vaults is covered. This earth had a frozen crust some three feet in thickness, and it was removed by undermining it and then breaking in the frozen crust with digging-bars. Just as the men were quitting work last evening, Mr. Kahl said he felt cold and would warm himself up by working a little. Taking a shovel he commenced to dig under the overhanging crust. A number of the workmen were around him, when some one called out that the crust was giving away.

All the men ran from beneath the falling earth and escaped. Mr. Kahl, who was moved, as though he thought he was not in danger. Instantly a large coil of frozen earth weighing several tons fell into the pit. The outer edge of it struck Mr. Kahl a sliding blow on the left shoulder, pushing him forward, throwing him to the ground and falling on his lower limbs. For a moment he held up his head, resting upon his hands, and then sank helpless to the earth. In a very few moments he was extricated and carried to the residence of Mrs. Urban, on a stretcher, where Dr. W. F. W. Urden and Dr. L. A. Wadson were almost immediately on the ground and attempted to resuscitate him by artificial respiration, but without success. Dr. L. A. Wadson was also soon in attendance, and the man was beyond earthly aid, and the body was soon afterward removed to the late residence of Mr. Kahl, St. Joseph's church, near St. Joseph's church.

Coroner Misher being notified called a jury and viewed the remains of the body. It was in no way disfigured except a slight abrasion on the left shoulder, and few bruises on the lower limbs. The jury adjourned to reconvene in the afternoon at 3 o'clock. The coroner's inquest will be held at the residence of Mr. Kahl, St. Joseph's church, near St. Joseph's church.
