Thoughts on a Certain Heresy of the Orthodox.

By the Author of "Mrs. Hopkins." There are few things more shocking to a reverent mind than the practice, so common among religious people, of jesting about certain awful possibilities which their faith implies.

To many people the dogma of everlasting punishment seems an abhorrent one, dishonoring to the Fatherhood of God and defeating the ends for which punishment is designed.

If any one possessed of human sympathy beheld another person in mortal danger the impulse would be to endeavor to save him from it. If we beheld persons starting on a journey, the end of which we could foresee to be disaster and death, we should labor to dissuade them from it by all means in our power.

It is for those about them for whom they predict the destiny of eternal torment if the life or belief of these others is not what it should be.

More than this, the subject is often made the topic of mirth and jest. Not long since, while in a company of orthodox people belonging to the Lutheran and Reformed churches, I heard one of the number say jestingly to another that he would get "sent to a warm place when he died if he didn't take care."

It is not in the same awful way, for such trifling is indeed awful if those who indulge in it believed in the possibility referred to. In any case such jesting is certainly out of place. But it is common enough. Current conversation is full of allusions to a future place of punishment couched, as it seems to me, in a most irreverent way.

Troublesome Children. There are always wetting their beds ought not to be scolded and punished for what they can not help. They need a medicine having a tonic effect on the kidneys and bladder.

Complications. If the thousands that now have their rest and comfort by the use of the above medicine were speedily cured. It acts on both organs at the same time and therefore completely restores them to their normal condition.
