FIGHTING OFFICIALS.

A War of Words between the Deputy Coroner and Court Reporter. There was a terrible excitement in the corridor of the court-house late yesterday afternoon, caused by an altercation between the deputy coroner and the court reporter.

The deputy coroner, who was walking in the corridor, was talking to a well-known notary public, on matters of great importance to themselves, but of no special interest to the public, when the court reporter and the notary public met also in the corridor, the quartet occupying the position described in the following engraving:

The court. The notary. The deputy coroner. The court reporter.

The court reporter halted the court and began a learned harangue on matters of law, instructing the court, for all we know, on some nice points of law to be made in the report.

This annoyed the deputy coroner to such an extent that finally losing his temper he said to the notary, "There is no use of our trying to talk here as long as that English blatherer skips being lawing."

The court reporter gave the deputy coroner a look of withering contempt, and in lofty majesty replied, "It is addressing the court, and not you, hahamable loafer like you."

The deputy coroner quick as lightning retorted, "You bang-banged rotten old English son of a bull-terrier, you blank-blank old hypocrite, you carry a hymn book and your eyes are on the ceiling of church and then you home and lie your wife, you doubly dashed posterity of canine parentage. Why there's nothing of a man about you except the plug hat you have on your head. Go home, you complimentary old Britisher to the country that spawned you."

"You loafer hand vagabondes" retorted the court reporter, "you idiot hand lunatic, you 'avent got had never 'ad a country, nor parentage neither, you were spawned upon the loose, you are no more but for impudence, 'ill 'ill punch your 'ead, you hasterick descendent 'of a mongrel cur."

"We have neither time nor type in which to reproduce the epithets hurled at each other by the coroner and the reporter. The epithets hurled at each other were four stories high, topped with mansard roofs, and having balconies of blasphemy running all around each story of the structure.

Blue blazes shot along the corridors of the court house, lighting up the faces of the started court officers, and names of fifty-nine witnesses. The belligerents stared each other to flight, the court reporter wishing to fight it out in the presence of the court, and the deputy coroner insisting on settling the matter outside.

The fight in the back of the corridor he jumped the fence in front of Mart Ulrich's saloon and dared the reporter to follow him. The latter appears to have not heard the challenge, for he remained on the back steps of the court house yelling "Treachery, Cowardism, damned treacherous coward," and hurling many far more expressive epithets after the retreating but not retreating deputy.

The end is not yet. To-day there are rumors that an early meeting will take place between the two officials, and it is confidently asserted that the reporter whose fighting weight is 89 pounds has placed himself in training under Clayt, Myers, and that the deputy coroner who weighs 91, is taking lessons in the noble art under the careful eye of Kahl Snyder.

A serious accident occurred to Miss Ella Hershey, who resides near Highville, Manor township, yesterday. They have a number of large cherry trees on the farm, and she, procuring a ladder, went to gather some of this ripe fruit. Unable to reach some fine bunches from the ladder she stepped upon a limb which unfortunately gave way, throwing her to the ground, a distance of some twenty feet or more, breaking four ribs and receiving a number of severe cuts and bruises about the head and back.

Mrs. Martin Manning, of the same place and near Mr. Hershey's farm, had an accident of like character and of equally as serious a nature. She, too, went to pick cherries from a very high tree; had left the ladder and went far out upon a limb; it broke and she fell a distance of over thirty feet. The principal bone of her left leg was split, and the same limb was broken below the knee; her spine was wrenched and she received several cuts and bruises. She was picked up sensible and taken to the house, where Dr. Davis attended her. Her present condition is, indeed, very serious.
