FARMER AND GARDENER.

TIMELY ADVICE FROM THE GERMAN-TOWN TELEGRAPH.

Particularly at this season, when grapes are ripening, the discussion is generally started as to the best method of preserving them through the winter. Some of these methods involve a great deal of labor, and after all are seldom successful and rarely worth the labor and expense.

As to grapes, they can very easily be kept in good condition until Christmas, and beyond that are very little cared for. And the best method to put them up is that pursued by the grape-growers of New York and Michigan—the clean, dry pine box, packing them, after removing all the decayed or over-ripe berries, firmly, without the addition of any substance, in a position—putting in the boxes, holding from two to four pounds, only the pure bunches of grapes.

We know of no better way; there may be; and if any of our readers possess it, we would be glad to make room for telling us what it is. "The Coming Tree." A contemporary contains an article under this heading, in which the eucalyptus globulus is referred to, and which is spoken of as just introduced into portions of the United States, and that it is adapted to every part of the republic. The article says further that it is "hardier than the chestnut, and like the latter will grow in the rockiest soils." Also, that "for the Eastern and Middle States, where the lack of forest protection is not unfrequently felt, no tree has been so valued by the culturist that can present so many primary points of vantage as this Australian immigrant, and its general introduction and culture should be a matter of but little time."

We have never seen an article of equal length containing so much ignorance and so many downright absurdities. In the first place, this tree was introduced into the southern parts of California about eight years ago, where it flourishes very well, and is regarded as a valuable tree in many respects. It will do very well in the Southern States; but to say that it is adapted to the Eastern or Middle States proves that the writer of the article in question was totally ignorant of what he undertook to inform others. We might as well expect the mango, the orange, the lemon, the pineapple, the palm-tree, &c., to grow here. During the Centennial celebration, a gentleman from California passing in front of our premises saw an eucalyptus growing in our front yard and he was surprised at seeing it so far North that he stopped to examine it, and said he had seen none so large since he had left California. It grew during the season about eight feet, but it fell a victim to the frost in the latter part of October. The plant was presented to us by Messrs. D. Landreth & Sons and was given under the name of "Forest Pine."

Forest Pine and More Timber. From all sides come discussions and suggestions on the timber question. Here before us is an article in a London paper, showing the enormous amount of cedar used for pens, and the incredible difficulty of obtaining it. Fearful, it is said, that the supply will fail, the celebrated Faber has bought a large tract of land and planted it with cedars, which may help his firm after he is gone, if it does no good to himself. The paper also tells us of a firm from New England. The mill owners use large quantities of spoils which are made from the birch, but the birch forests are giving out, and what are they to do next? So it is with various grades and occupations, requiring peculiar kinds of woods in their manufactures. The timber which they severally require is undoubtedly getting scarcer, and it is a natural anxiety which asks us what are we going to do about it?

The only response is, plant more. But who is to do it and how is it to be done? The majority of citizens who are imbued with the majesty of the law, think government ought to do it. Governments do it in other countries, why should not ours attempt what others successfully do? It does not follow as a thing of course. Other governments are paternal. They are accustomed to supply their immediate necessities, and provide for the future. Our government is our servant. It is simply to keep peace and order among ourselves, and to so arrange that each citizen shall have the largest liberty possible without infringing on the liberty of others. Our security is in keeping down in every possible way the number of office holders, otherwise the government becomes the master, not the servant, of the people. The number of office holders is already much too large, and it thus becomes a question whether if the government went to the forest business or any scale worthy of so large a country, the attendant evils would be greater than the good to be accomplished. This is a question for statesmen, and as they are not likely to agree about it, we cannot hope for such direct government aid.

It is evident that the whole subject is one beset with difficulties. That timber is growing scarcer we all know; that an abundance of timber is essential to our national progress is clear; that some precautions should be taken against waste, and some encouragement to raise new forests is desirable, all men will believe; but just how to do about all this is a problem that has not yet been well-worked out.
