BYAN'S ACCOUNT OF IT.

iie Was Beaten After the Second Round and MI SIGAL BOXES. A worn and weary looking man was Paddy Ryan, the pugilist, when he alighted from the limited express in the Pennsylvania railroad depot in Jersey City. He bore evidences of the hard kneeks he received in the Southern battle. The bridge of his nose showed the result of a collision with Sallivan's fist and a bunch on the left side of his neck filled out his collar. Two pieces of court plaster concealed a couple of cuts on the left side of the upper lip. A heavy stubble contended with the plaster and only where it was drawn down into the cuts did it adhere to the flesh. Paddy was bundled to the chin in a brown overcoat, and wore a low Derby hat which was set rather jauntily on his head. Paddy's friends brought him across the river and landed him in a beer saloon in Chatham street, where he refreshed himself with a glass of heavy ale and then divested himself of his overcoat. He was dressed in a black cut away coat, and a pin, consisting of a piece of glass, through pin, consisting of a piece of glass, through which could be seen the picture of a buildeg's head pasted on the back, was attached to a blue silk neck-scarf with threads of gold running diagonally through it. While Paddy was taiking with his friends his backer, Richard K. Fox, and William Harding came in and shock hands William Harding came in and shook hands with him. When the reporter asked him f it was true that his fighting days were over Paddy replied, in a half-mournful voice, "Yes." Big Bill McDavitt said it was none of the reporter's business what Paddy was going to do hereafter, but Paddy himself said he did not know. He Paddy himself said he did not know. He had not determined whether to go back to Troy and set himself up in business. "He's got an offer of $200 a month," said McDavitt. "Oh, I guess I can get something to do," remarked Patly. When sparring exhibitions were suggested to him he took kindly to the idea.
