A TALE OF TWO SEASONS.

How the Riches of Life are Sometimes Made and Lost in the Ambitions of Love.

Chicago Tribune.

"Good-by, Myrtle."

"So long, Myrtle," replied the girl, a tall, brown beauty with dark, gleaming eyes and a wealth of amber tresses that would have been said anywhere outside of a novel. She stood on the veranda that June evening; the honeysuckles clustering in vivid bloom still clung here, while he to whom she spoke lay dead at the foot of the steps, standing there irresolutely with the evident hope that the proud beauty, whose fair pair still stockings were now gleaming faintly in the half-light of the gloom, would say the word that should bring him back to her side to seal again with burning kisses and honeyed words of love the vows that had been but just broken.

"Must I go, sweetheart?" asked Ethelbert, looking up with a wistful, half-quitting expression during his week's stay.

"No, Miss Cecilia Charles," replied Myrtle, using the pet name by which he was known, "but you had better go away and try to forget me—try to let the pleasure which she always at their constant meetings with him, known as "Dr. C. W. Benson's Skin Cure," it makes the skin white, soft and smooth, removes tan and freckles, and is the best toilet dressing in the world. It is elegant to put up two bottles in one package, consisting of both cream and external ointment. One bottle should suffice to cure this and not some old remedy resurrected from the success of Dr. Benson's and now advertised as "The Great Skin Cure." There is only one—it bears the Doctor's picture and is for sale by all druggists. It per package.

A year has passed. The winter which came so suddenly and crept gently along in soft, white robes has gone. The sweet spring days, with perfume hints of roses and violets, and fresh emerald leaves, and climbing vines, and budding blossoms, are here. In the parlors of stately residence a gay company of young people are assembled. It is the last party of the season, and Myrtle Hathaway, the acknowledged belle of the year, is as usual the centre of attraction. She stands with charming grace beside a marble figure of Psyche that ornaments a recess in the conservatory, and is chattering gaily with Bertie Cecil—"handsome Bertie" the woman call him—who has the beauty of an Apollo and the savor of a hired man.

"What has become of Ethelbert Mc Guire?" Myrtle suddenly asks. "I have not seen him in ever so long." Bertie looks at her with an astonished expression.

"Do you know, then?" he says.

The girl shakes her head. "I supposed you heard," he said. "Ethelbert met with a disappointment about a year ago; the old story, they tell me, of a man's love for a faithless woman. He never vented his spleen, but God knows he suffered enough." It is not a slight grief that will make a man indulge in dissipation until his life is a wreck."

Myrtle's face became pallid. "Is he then so very dissipated?" she asked.

"I should guess," replied Bertie. "He smokes cigarettes every day now."

Myrtle recoiled, and would have fallen had not Bertie caught her. "You are ill, Miss Hathaway," he exclaimed in anxious tones. "Something I have said has caused this."

Recovering herself by a mighty effort Myrtle spoke: "I am better now," she said. "It was nothing but the pie."

"Ah," said Bertie, "I had forgotten the pie."

Preference.

"Are you traveling alone?" asked a tall, agricultural-looking gentleman, approaching a lady who occupied two seats in a crowded car. "No, sir," she replied. "May I ask you who's with you?" asked the man, looking around vainly for some other place to store himself. "My husband," snapped the lady with flashing eyes. "My husband is a traveling man," "Oh, ah! excuse me," and the tall man straightened up and prepared to take a standing ride. "In this seat engaged?" asked a dashing, well dressed young fellow of the lady five minutes later. "No, sir," she replied, and down he plumped. "I say ma'am!" protested the tall man, "is that your husband?" "No it isn't, and you needn't ask any more questions," retorted the woman. "But you said you were traveling with him," persisted the tall man. "So I am," snorted the lady. "Where is he?" insisted the tall man. "He's in the baggage car in a coffin," replied the lady.

Newark, N. J., Aug. 11, 1880.
Dear Brother—Your letter breathes in all the salt air of the ocean, and having been a sufferer for more than a year with a refractory liver, I was induced to make the trial of your Balsam. On the first day I found the structure a glorious result. I have been greatly helped by the Balsam, and am not afraid to say my cure is now perfect.

Yours without a strungie,
José Billings.
