HEALTH NOTES.

TIMELY TOPICS FOR THE MIDSUMMER.

Some Sensible Suggestions to Sojourners, and Much Good Advice to the Can't-Get-Way Brigade. Philadelphia Ledger.

The yearly exodus which occurs at this season and which temporarily diminishes the population of Philadelphia by many thousands, is not to be regarded simply as the result of a desire for change or search for pleasure, as made in compliance with the demands of fashion, or even as a natural attempt to avoid personal discomfort. Underlying all the comparatively trivial agencies is the recognition of two important sanitary facts. One of these is the necessity which almost every one feels to a greater or less extent for some vacation of some and occupation, not merely as a means of enjoyment, but as a help to health and strength. This is a well-recognized theme, but none the less important. Holidays are too few and working hours too long for most of the busy classes in this country, and summer vacations go but a little way in supplying the deficiency. It would be well if the customary week or two could be doubled, and every busy, industrious, hard worked man and woman, from professional people to laborers, got full share of an idle time, with fresh air and relaxation. This, however, is not the only or, perhaps, not the chief cause which takes so many thousands to the country, or to the mountains or seashore. An equally potent agency is found in the general recognition of the fact, as to which there can be no doubt, that a large city in this latitude is not the best place for little children during the hot summer months. But those who go, constitute, after all, the small minority of the residents of any such city, most of these being kept there for the greater part of the summer by the demands of business or the exigency of poverty. It would be well if these people could be induced to take a more judiciously to the health of themselves and their children, and could be induced for the sake of both, to study and observe some more simple sanitary regulations. A few of these may be briefly indicated.

Avoid unnecessary fatigue and excitement, mental and physical; eat at regular hours and in moderation, abstaining from excess of meats and favoring fresh and perfectly ripe vegetables; drinking freely of pure milk or water, small quantities at a time; bathe the frequently and change the underclothing every day or two. Observe scrupulous cleanliness as to all portions of your dwelling, and especially as to the sinks, gutters, cellars, privies or water closets. Soap and water and ventilation are the best disinfectants for dwellings or sleeping rooms. Have air in the best long-ventilated, and has been recently asserted that "the only certain and unassailable rule of hygiene which will bear universal application, is that pure air is good for the human animal, and that the more he has of it the better."

The mother who is nursing her baby and who carefully observes these rules, which are very easily understood and as easily followed, is caring not only for her own health but also for that of her child. For her special benefit, however, some additional suggestions may be made. Bathe the child once a day or sponge it with lukewarm water; dress it lightly and coolly; change its clothes at night; let it sleep by itself in a cradle or a trundle-bed; feed it at regular intervals; and, above all, do not neglect to clean the child to quiet it by drops of quack nostrums or any of the numerous mixtures that put the baby to sleep only at the expense of its health—possibly its life. If it can by any possibility be avoided do not wean an infant until the summer, but if the supply of food furnished by the mother is insufficient supplement it with goat's or cow's milk to which one-third of water has been added, or, if that disagrees, which has been mixed with a small quantity of lime-water. For infants already weaned, say from six months to eighteen months, the diet should consist of milk, from one to three pints in twenty-four hours; dry bread, rusk or milk crackers; beef-juice or beef tea; chicken or mutton broths; a very little mealy potato, with a small quantity of boiled rice, corn starch or sago. The chief article of diet should be the milk; the other articles may be added as the child grows older, and the heaviest meal should be taken in the middle of the day.

By following the general plan here indicated and by taking every opportunity to secure for the child the benefit of the fresh air of the park, the squares, the rivers, the sanitarium, or even the cool sides of the largest streets at sunset, it will be possible to bring children, to whom a little neglect will prove fatal, through the summer, and it is the duty of every conscientious parent to see that such practice is adhered to as far as practicable. In spite of precaution, however, a certain number of cases of illness, chiefly of cholera infantum, will occur among the children. If a child suddenly becomes pale, is covered with clammy perspiration and is attacked with vomiting and purging, it will be proper, after having sent for a physician, to administer a teaspoonful of castor oil, to cover it with a light, warm blanket, to place hot bottles near its feet and legs, to apply a warm mustard poultice (four-fifths flour) to its abdomen, and if it continues to lose strength and its skin remains cold and moist, to give four or five drops of brandy in a little water every fifteen to twenty minutes. While these simple remedial measures will often convert a threatening case into one quite amenable to treatment.

TONSILLOID REFORM.
A Novel Plan For Doing away with Barber's Shave.

Every man who has been in a barber shop, and it is taken for granted that every man gets there occasionally, has experienced the discomforts of the average barber shop. The close smell of the shop which is usually in a basement. The strong perfume on the hands, which he insists on rubbing over your mouth and nose and against which you dare not protest. The long waiting for your turn with a favorite barber and if you are not a regular customer the questions as to who cut that hair, etc., together with numberless small annoyances, make all men take an interest in the fact that the barbers have taken a new departure, or rather revived an old custom, and while it can never be popular on account of the expense, it will greatly mollify the sufferings of those who can pay for it, and who are in the habit of going to the barber shop every day. The plan is for the barber to go to his customer instead of having the customer go to the shop. A smart young barber with good address will secure the custom of ten to twenty regular customers and he readily picks out the best customers from the shop at which he works before he gives up his situation. These customers are carefully selected as to the time they want to be shaved, so that the barber can serve all at exactly the desired time. The customers secured, the barber is independent, and as he can serve all the way from fifteen to twenty per day, charges from $2 to $5 per week, he can make a good thing of it, much better than the average young man who rarely gets over $15 per week, and it is very satisfactory to the customer—the barber, in fact, doing about all that a valet would do. He can arrange the bath, get out the change of clothes and change the studs and collar buttons to the clean shirt, besides shaving the face and clipping the hair, all in the half hour which is usually devoted to each customer and the price usually asked is not excessive when the time lost in waiting, fees to the brush boy and the perfumes, pomades, etc., which are so much to be counted, are counted, and the pleasure of having everything done at home in good style, and above all exactly at the time you want it done, more than makes up for a little extra expense, and with certain people it is sure to become popular. It is said that there are over five hundred barbers in New York who are working on this plan, and the fact that the ones who are running shops are complaining of the system, give the statement an air of probability, as yet every barber in this line works independently, but no doubt the time will come when one man will have fifteen or twenty shops working for him and for whose work he will be responsible.

A NOVELLETTE IN LETTERS.
A Short but Pointed Correspondence, With A Moral to It.
London World.
[From Mrs. Mortimer to Algernon T., Esq., White's Club.]

MY DEAR ALGERNON: I write to you in the greatest distress. A short time ago, in a great moment, I raised a little money on some of my husband's family plate and the vulgar person who advanced the cash has just informed me that unless I pay him before the end of the week he will put in what he calls "an execution": something dreadful of that sort. To add to my troubles, John may be back any day from Caribbad. I don't know what to do. Perhaps you understand these matters. Will you look in to-morrow after six and give me the benefit of your advice? I am all alone and do so want a little sympathy. Tour affec. friend,
NELLIE MORTIMER.

P. S.—It is only a matter of a wretched £300.

[From Algernon T. to Mrs. Mortimer, Chestnut Square.]
MY DEAR MRS. MORTIMER: I cannot tell you how much I sympathize with you. To my endless regret I am obliged to go North to night, otherwise nothing would have kept me from Chester Square to-morrow. Couldn't a lawyer fellow manage this business for you? His advice would probably be better worth following than that of your always,
ALGERNON T.

[From Mrs. Mortimer to the Hon. Edward Edward to Mrs. Mortimer.]
DEAR DOLLY: I know that you are awfully good natured, and would do anything to help Edward in distress. I have a debt of £300 which I must pay before Saturday, and I dare not apply to John. I have serious thoughts of either chloral or the river Thames. Your unfortunate cousin,
NELLIE MORTIMER.

[From the Hon. Edward T., Hounslow Barrecks to Mrs. Mortimer.]
DEAR NELLIE: Don't do anything rash. I would take the liberty of asking you to make use of my check book; but, unfortunately, I am afraid that any of the contents thereof for which you might use would be returned to me with an ominous "N. S." You know that there is nothing I wouldn't do for you, even to selling Ranger and the Colonel; but I am afraid that, at the present time of year, they would not fetch more than £150 at outside at Tattersall's. Yours very regretfully, EDWARD T.

[From Mrs. Mortimer to John Mortimer, esp., Caribbad.]
MY DEAR JOHN: I am almost too frightened to write to you. For the last two months I have had a debt (which, for our limited income, is, I fear, a very large one) hanging over me. Unless I have £300 within a week something dreadful will happen. Can you ever forgive me? Yours very penitently,
NELLIE MORTIMER.

[From John Mortimer to Mrs. Mortimer.]
DEAR NELLIE: Check for £300 enclosed. Why didn't you let me know before? Be a good little woman and don't get into debt again. Your affectionate husband, JOHN MORTIMER.

Human Prejudice.
Some one has wisely said: "There is nothing stronger than human prejudice;" and this is true. Especially are some minds prejudiced against "quack" medicines, because some such medicines are shams, they lead to the conclusion that all are. As well as because of the ordinary medicines, there are here and there some of all good things, even of gold and green, and there is no true money, and there are true medicines. Among the latter is HENRY'S REMEDY, true and tried and what is more, it is a medicine which has been used and saved from the grave by it. For all diseases of the kidneys, and extending in disorder, it is a medicine to a peer. Physicians prescribe it, and the public buy it. It is cheaper to buy a bottle of it yourself, and take it according to directions, than to pay for your prejudice by receiving it at the hands of your physician at ten times the cost?
