

ACTORS IN SUMMER TIME.

HOW THEY SPEND THEIR VACATION.

Throwing their Hard-Earned Money Away Like Water—Col. Stubbins' Story.

New York Sun.

The bland and pleasing actor whose acquaintance the reporter had made stood with rare grace of posture on Union square, idly lapping with his cane the toe of a mature boot which simulated juvenile idleness by trying to hide beneath a faded drab over-gaiter.

"Ah, there?" he said cheerfully, in a large and rotund voice. "How's your warm day—dog, is it?"

He smelt the easy air of a man of the world, and, clasping his hands behind him, stood as a prosperous banker stands before a comfortable grate fire, gently raising himself first on his heels, then on his toes, and looking benign, gracious and conversational.

Altogether he clearly shaven face was a tall, white hat irrefutable of the fashion of the year before last. His coat had the meritorious air of the coat that feels aggrieved at being lugged out for a third summer season, but is resolved to ignore the missing second button and make an earnest effort not to appear shriveled in the sleeves. His trousers were wrinkled and puckered in a multitude of discouraged corrugations about the knees. But his face was serene and placid, and he bowed occasionally with great suavity to the gentlemen who passed by.

"Dogs' days for the boys, sir; dogs' days for the boys," he said impressively, "as my season has been one of extraordinary success; by the poor fellow have a mighty tough outlook with the summer before them."

He glanced about impassionately. On the broad walk in front of the Union Square theatre stood scores of men, all wearing the pronounced "profession" look, and talking loudly in little groups of three and five. They were dressed in as many different styles as there were men, from the spruce and dapper first juvenile, encaused in all the agony of an imported Derby, to the hungry-looking, song-and-dance performer, out at the toes in the waist and indefinite as to hat.

There were a few who wore their hair long, and tried to appear interesting in long black frock coats and baggy trousers. Occasionally here and there a manager strode about in good clothes.

"The profession," continued the loquacious actor, "is looking rather bunged up." "Where do you pass the summer?"

"Here—er—that is, I am not decided; then with a candid and confidential air: "The fact is, I'm keeping a watchful eye open for a job, and until I get it I'm going to stop here on the square."

"I often wonder what actors do in the summer."

"The actor, sir, is confoundedly extravagant and insane in his tastes. You know actors spend their summers. Why, those who have a money starve, and those who have worked like white slaves for ten months spend the whole of their earnings in two months of summer and begin the next season penniless. Look, for instance, at the very best fellow on the stage, John T. Raymond, and ask yourself if he looks like a man subject to insane freaks. And yet no man will tell you more readily than himself how he passed the first summer following his success. He had been working like a beaver, and cleared a clean $80,000 in cash. No bonumbe, you know, a clean sixty thousand," reiterated the actor, gravely. "One would suppose that with so close a remembrance of the sting of poverty he would have put away a snug little 4 egg and felt more at ease. Did John do it? No! He immediately bought all the clothes he could, treated all the boys, and disappeared for a few days, when he suddenly splurged out in a style that no man could understand. He went up to Tarrytown on the Hudson and bought the magnificent Blerstadt estate paying as much as he could out of his sixty thousand, and borrowing extra money at 3 per cent. besides. He had eight servants, resided in the most gorgeous house in the country, and had a castle, a superb estate, and every thing he could think of buying that would add to his splendor. By gracious, sir, it was positively amazing the style John put on that first month! The place was surrounded by the magnificence of a noble like the Gouls, Rhinelanders, Hoos, Aspinwalls and Kindlands, people who were living on the income of millions. They looked on Raymond with amazement. He was living in greater style with his handful of money than they were with their banks full. Nothing could equal the magnificence with which John slung wealth around the village. He began to invite all the boys—every one. It didn't make any difference to John how great a fair his friends looked at. He started out with the crowd. Actors who felt the heat of the summer's day and had cravings for bread and water were astonished by receiving such telegrams as this:

DEAR JIMMY: Take the 10:15 a. m. train for Tarrytown; my baggage meets you at depot. What kind of wine do you drink? JOHN T. RAYMOND.

"They'd go up, and there would be the landau with a couple of fiery horses, a stiff-necked coachman, and an imported footman in gold and brown, with John sitting erect in the landau, his legs bent over his eyes, and a smile of ineffable serenity on his face. If there were ten teams—jardons me, I refer to the lower grade of actors; 'tis a term we sometimes allow ourselves to use—if there were ten of them, by gracious, sir, John would have the whole crowd in the vehicle and sit on the legs of the footman. Well, sir, he went on giving dinners and entertaining like a potentate for two months, and then returned to the drudgery of playing without a sign, $60,000 out. This summer he is living like a lord at Long Branch, and divides his time between playing with his baby and matching dollars."

"That was a costly freak."

"Yes, but not at all unusual. Look at Melton Rankin in the Detroit river and he has a keeper and game preserve there. He has built a superb house and in the summer entertains lavishly. He has no end of servants and lives like a prince, only to come back again and start anew on the inevitable grind. Sometimes it has a rather pernicious effect, too. The example is bad. Fred Marsden, who writes pieces for the stage, became a victim to the summer castle mania and rushed into a big country seat in the Adirondacks; but he found that he couldn't run the place in the style of a millionaire the first year, so he decided to economize the first year and wandered about enthusiastically asking people to come and see him next year."

The loquacious actor coughed with great difficulty behind his left hand, and then gently settled his collar with the tip of his fingers, all of which caused a large and transparent ornament on a conspicuous rivet to blink so in the glare of the sun that passers-by stopped to talk to each other about the diamond.

"Frank Mayo is another instance of the desire to have a 'home,'" he continued affably. "When he had cleared his first $50,000 on Dany Crockett he went into the wilds of Pennsylvania and built a place he called 'Crockett Lodge.' It was a beautiful and almost inaccessible point in the mountains, and when Dany goes there to spend his summers he almost dies of loneliness."

Way will you cough when shiloh's cure will give immediate relief. Price, 10 cts., 50 cts., and $1. For sale at Cochran's drug store, 137 North Queen street.
