AND $65,000 STATE MONEY WITH HIM.

Cashier Craik Robs the Bank of Franklin. The town of Franklin, Venango county, Pa., was startled on Saturday when a report was circulated that J. N. Craik, cashier of the Exchange bank of that city, was a defaulter to a large amount. The report was verified by the president of the bank, John L. Mitchell, and for a few hours after the bank opened great excitement prevailed and a run on the bank was commenced by the small depositors. It quickly subsided, however, when it became known that sufficient funds were on hand to pay the depositors in full, and some of those who had drawn their funds again deposited them. The directors of the bank, assisted by the assistant cashier, Thomas Alexander, and Mr. Husband, of J. W. Mitchell & Co. bank, Oil City, commenced overhauling the books and counting the funds and securities to ascertain the amount of the default. They are unable to make a statement as to the amount of the defaultation as yet.

From the best information obtainable it is believed that the bank will lose not less than $100,000, and it may largely exceed that figure. It is quite certain that Craik was speculating with the funds of the bank for about two years, but has always succeeded in covering his lack until the present time. Indeed, his manner of using funds has almost defied detection. At the quarterly examination of the condition of the bank made by the directors in the most thorough manner, his books and cash were found to be correct every time. He took an active part in securing Baily's election. For this friendship the latter gave the Exchange bank a deposit of $55,500, and it appears that only $20,000 was ever credited on the books and the balance Craik converted to his own use. J. P. Cook, a prominent citizen, deposited security for a loan of $2,000 worth of Venango water company bonds, and it appears that Craik took these bonds to Pittsburgh and hypothecated the same to raise cash for speculative purposes. Eight hundred dollars worth of the funds of the Venango bank, a military company, of which Craik was treasurer, was also used the same way.

Speculating Largely in Petroleum. Other funds are reported missing, but particulars are wanting. It is quite certain, however, that his speculations were largely in petroleum, and he was unfortunate as one of the investors in eighty cent oil before the Warren field was opened, which depreciated prices largely, and to sustain himself he used the bank funds. He also invested in Colorado, and was secretary of the Ajax mining company, composed of some of the wealthiest citizens. He was one of the most trusted and respected citizens, popular with all classes, and the last man to be suspected of dishonesty. He is now at his residence completely prostrated and unable to give information which is important for the directors to know before they can complete a settlement for the public. He is a son of E. Craik, of Uniontown, and brother of Major Craik, of the same place. He is a deacon in the Presbyterian church and was held in high esteem in the community.

The Bank a Strong One. The Exchange bank is one of the strongest institutions in the state. The stockholders are individually liable, among them being L. Mitchell, F. W. Mitchell, E. H. Weidner, R. R. Hoag, J. H. D. Kinnor and other wealthy citizens. The bank will not seriously feel the loss. Mr. Craik has not been arrested as yet, but is under police surveillance.

A later dispatch says the directors of the bank made a statement that the loss is so far as ascertained is $65,000, which is a state deposited, but for which Craik failed to give credit on the books, and some $12,000 special deposits, which the bank will refuse to pay and will contest the matter in the courts. Craik is an excellent cashier of the bank, entered bonds of $10,000, his father and brother becoming his security. Craik is reported as dangerously ill and unable to see anyone.

A QUEER MURDER CASE.

A Child With a Curious Head Convicted of Parricide. In St. Louis on Saturday a sensational murder case came to a very unexpected ending. The prisoner was a young girl, Clayton, a suburb of that city, Guy Smith, a twelve-year-old boy killed his father. The trouble began in a quarrel between Guy and his brother over a milk pail. Guy's brother complained to his father, and the father in turn scolded the child. The boy then finished milk, quietly returned to the house with his father, deliberately washed his hands and went into his grandmother's room, from which he took a double barreled gun, and returning to the kitchen, where his father was washing his hands, deliberately levelled the gun and fired at his father, inflicting a wound from which Smith died in eight hours. These facts were fully established at the trial and the defense, making no attempt to contradict them, sought to prove that the prisoner was insane. A hung jury was finally expected to be the result of the trial, but they returned a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. The youthful parricide is quite small for his age, with innocent and pleasant features and a peculiarly shaped head, narrowing to the top like a cone. The concentric formation his lawyers chiefly relied to make out their case. He was cool and collected throughout the trial and during a recess of the court amused himself by making spit-balls and tossing them around the room, drawing caricatures of people who had interested him and displayed an utter unconsciousness generally of the seriousness of his position. He claimed in his evidence that his father "kicked" his brother lighter than he did him, and that he shot at his father, with the intention of hurting, not killing him.

BROWN'S IRON BITTERS. A Remarkable Story. A Maryland Beauty Robbed of Her Treasures. Hagerstown Dispatch to Baltimore Day. The death of Miss Jennie Boggs, a prepossessing young lady of sixteen years of age, occurred under singular and distressing circumstances, and the physicians who were in attendance state that the young lady's demise was occasioned solely by grief. Miss Boggs was a member of the family of Mrs. George Frazier, and was highly respected by all who enjoyed the pleasure of her acquaintance in Hagerstown. She was a beautiful brunette, and her long wavy locks, when permitted to flow over her shoulders, to her feet, Miss Boggs was regarded as the belle of her circle, and many young ladies were envious of her fresh young beauty and handsome looks.

About two weeks ago Miss Boggs was aroused from sleep at midnight by a noise of some one walking in her room. She arose in her bed, and as she did so she observed a man about to leave the room. The inmates of the house were aroused, but no trace of the intruder could be found. It was the general opinion of those in attendance that the intruder was some one who desired to cut off her hair, or a friend of some jealous rival.

On last Thursday night a week, Miss Boggs came in from a horseback ride, and was in the best of spirits. She chatted with Mrs. Frazier until quite late, and then repaired to her room for the night. The bedchamber occupied by Miss Boggs was on the second floor overlooking the rear yard. The columns of an old-fashioned portico reared their heads to a level with the window and supported a small roof. The night being exceedingly warm the young lady sat on the little roof in the moonlight and loosened her magnificent hair. Mrs. Frazier cried out good-naturedly to her that she would catch her death of cold. The girl laughingly replied that she was bathing in the moonlight and dew, and could not possibly forsake so pleasant a task for the sleep god. At midnight, however, she went in and was heard to close and secure the shutters to her window.

When the servants arose next morning they found the side door ajar. They conjectured that some member of the family had arisen before them, and said nothing concerning their discovery. Breakfast was served and Miss Boggs did not come down. She usually arose late, and was not disturbed until seven o'clock. At that time screams issued from the young lady's room. Several members of the family hastened up stairs and found Miss Jennie in a swoon. Her appearances were so changed that they could scarcely recognize her. Her hair had been entirely cut away and removed.

Restoratives were applied and Miss Boggs was revived. Between her sobs she stated that she had slept soundly during the night, and awoke in the morning to find that her locks had been shorn. She was a sound sleeper, and the deed had been committed while she slumbered so dexterously as not to arouse her. An investigation of the premises revealed the fact that the side door had been entered by the agency of a skeleton key, which had also served to unlock the door opening into the young lady's bed chamber. The person who committed the heinous crime did not retire by the door, but was evidently so afraid of detection that he escaped by the bell-chamber window, and the police commenced the pursuit of booted feet were found at the base of the columns, and the vines which entwined about the pillars were slightly disarranged.

Miss Boggs wept throughout Friday and into the night. On Saturday morning she appeared calmer, but during the day she again gave way to her great grief. She declined to see friends, and shut herself up in her room. Wednesday she was in such a nervous condition that medical aid was summoned. Remedies were used, however, and the young lady grew rapidly worse and died yesterday morning of a broken heart. She was buried Sunday evening, and the funeral train was one of the largest ever witnessed in Hagerstown. There is positively no clue to the identity of the person who practically murdered the murderer of poor Jennie Boggs.
