SCIENCE AND ART. Early History of Gas Lighting. The city of Chaumont has taken the initiative in the erection of a statue in honor of Phillippe Lebon, a native of Brachay (Haute-Marne), France, who, so the French claim, was the inventor of gas Many managers and directors of gas works, and a number of scientific men throughout France, have promised the town of Chaumont their support. A provisory committee has been formed, with the mayor of Chaumont as an hon-orary president, and M. Foucart, presi-dent of the Technical Society of Gas Industry in France, as the active presi-In order to place before our readers the correct idea of Lebon's relations with this wonderful invention, we give the following brief sketch of the early history of gas making : As early as 1726 Stephen Hales, in his "Vegetable Statistics," states that he obtained 186 cubic inches of an inflammable gas from the distillation of 128 grains of Newcastle coal. Bishop Watson, in his "Chemical Essays," describes experiments made on coal gas, and says that it does not lose its illuminating power when passed through water. Lord Dundonald, of Scotland, took out a patent in 1787 for making coal tar, and erected ovens for this purpose. He obtained, besides the coal tar, a quantity of coal gas, which was burnt in Culoross Abbey, and considered a great curiosity.

About the year 1792, William Murdoch a Scotchman, living in Redruth, Cornwall, began making experiments, and found that when coal was heated in an iron re tort an inflammable was given off, and with this gas he lighted his residence. Murdoch, possessing the characteristic slowness of his people, made no further use of the gas than burning it for the amusement of his friends, and it was nearly ten years before his invention was published abroad. In the meantime Phillipe Lebon, mentioned at the beginning of this article, who was then engineer of bridges and roads, began making experiments by heating wood, peat, etc., in retorts, and found that these bodies, by the action of heat, yielded an inflam-mable gas, which could be used not only for illumination, but also for the produc-tion of heat and power. His apparatus he called a thermolamp.

According to French authors he lighted his residence in Paris in 1796. In 1798, he read a paper before the French academy describing his thermolamp, and this paper was translated into English and German by Winsor. In 1799 he obtained a patent in France for producing a gas from peat., and applying it to purposes of illumination and heating.

Two years later the brother of James Watt, being in Paris, wrote to England, saying "that if anything were to be done with Mr. Murdoch's gas, it must be done at once, as there was a Frenchman in Paris who had similar ideas and proposed to illuminate that city by these means."
Even after receiving this broad hirt, M... Murdoch took no stave toward securing his invention by a patent, little realizing that this simple invention, in less than a century, would be developed into one of the greatest industries in the world.

Lebon had received a theoretical educa tion, and although his theories were good, there were practical difficulties in the way which he was unable to overcome, while, on the other hand, Murdoch was more of a practical man, and, therefore, was not hindered so much with practical difficul-ties, and for this reason he is considered the inventor of practical gas-lighting, for, previous to his experiments, illuminating gas only a curiosity, and by rendering its manufacturing practical he made it an cveryday necessity. In 1792 Murdoch lighted his workshop in Redruth with gas. The first more extensive gas work was established by him in 1802, at the Sobo foundry, near Birmingham, and in 1804 a spinning mill in Manchester was lighted with gas. It was first introduced in this country in Baltimore in 1821, in Boston in 1822 and

New York in 1827. The reason way wood-gas made by Lebon was inferior to coal-gas, was afterds explained by Dumas, who proved 'employed by Lebon, the gas tion of woon of marsh gas and carconsisted larger, bonic oxide.

Dr. Pettenkofer fouth. vapors of tar and empyre. "wood at given off by the carbonization of wood at a comparatively low temperature, farther heated by passing through a rea hot retort, a very large quantity of heavy hydrocarbon gas remains among the products, thereby greatly increasing its illuminating power.

One of the large gas companies in New York is at present engaged in the manufacture of gas from wood. All the other gas companies in that city, except two, are manufacturing gas from coal very similar to the manner pursued by Murdoch. The principal improvements which have been made have been in respect to its purifica-
