TRUE ECONOMY.

BI ROETTE'S ADVICE TO YOUNG MEN The Hawkeye Man Moralizes on the Filght of Time and Makes Some Very Sensible Suggestions.

Burlington Hawkeye. It is well, my boy, to save some of your strength for old age. Don't waste it all, and don't use it all up in the pleasures and toils and follies of youth. Save some of it. Save a good deal of it. In the expressive dialect of Arkansaw, save up a right smart heap of it, and you can use it right peart and still have a right consider able left for your old age. But save it principally from your dissipation, my boy. Save it by going to bed at ten rather than by sitting up to drink beer until half-past one. Too much sleep is injurious, it is true, but then fifteen hours sleep will harm you less than six hours of wine sup-Go slow on these things, my boy, and at sixty you will have ten years of forty-five left in brawn and blood and

But don't be so saving of your youthful strength that you will have all of it left at sixty. Because you won't. You may save it, but it won't be there. It will waste by disuse. Just now is the time when you must work the hardest, but as I told you a little while ago, hard work won't hurt you.

Improve your time, my boy. Put in every minute in honest hard work, or tranquil meditation, or healthful recreation. That is all I ask you to do. Oh, 'you believe you'll select meditation as a profession," then, do you? It strikes you that it is easy work to sit and think, ch? Now, my boy, if you want some thing easy, you had much better stand and chop wood. It isn't easy to think We don't think half as much as we want to make people believe we do. In fact, we don't think nearly so much as we think we do. Busy thought and aimless idleness are often very similar in external appearance. Edison, sitting before his tireless forge, with his hands folded listlessly in his lap, looking at nothing, may be apparently as idle, even idler, than the man perched on the end of a cottonwood log, watching his cork bob lazily in the yellow water of a sluggish creek. But the results are in one instance the telephone and the electric light, and in the other the ague and a softmouthed sucker and a cattlsh four inches long. The one dreams out marvellous inventions that thrill the world with wonder and multiply commercial activity, and gives them to the eager, waiting world or at least he sells them to Jay Gould and Jay Gould sells them to the world, and the other contracts a malarial fever and gives it to his family. It is not easy to think; we waste more time than we use, and the hours slip away so noiselessly and easily, we don't know where they have gone. I have sometimes thought, Telemachur if a man could only have always present with him some constant reminder of the flight of time; if he could have in his room a great hour glass, laden with just the equal and exact sands of his life. If he could every day watch the steadily dropping grains, and knew that when they all ran through, the last grain would just complete his grave. If when he closed his eyes he knew that all night long the priceless grains ran through, if in the silent hours of darkness when he awoke he could drip, drip of a water clock. If when he came in from a journey he could see how much of the sands of his life had run out while he journeyed for pleasure or profit. If, sometimes, he could stand before it and watch the swift grains running away with his life; and he could feel that alway and alway, night and day, sleeping or waking, fasting or feasting, working or resting, wherever he went or whatever he did, no faster, no slower, steadily, pitilessly, the sands ran through, and alway every hour the life heap above fell away and the grave below piled up and up. If he could realize that uo thought or care, or skill or learning could make them run more slowly by and by, or add one light grain to the measure meted out and sealed against his life by the inexorable fates, I wonder how many of the dropping grains he would turn into gold by the alchemy of his industry?

in thirty days. Some night, when you came in late from a toilsome game of "draw," so to speak, or a walking match around a billiard table, or some popular nightmare known as a brilliant spectacular drama, you would look at your warning hour glass and say, "By George it seems to me sand is getting distressingly scarce in the upper story. Je-roo-salem! How these boots do hurt my feet. I'd like to kill the man that made 'cm." And you would be sound asleep in twenty minutes. Reminders? Why, the world is full of reminders that our lives are slipping away. made them merrier. "See what you are coming to," they shouted, and ate and drank like a poor relation at his annual dinner party, to which he was invited to fill up. Fill up the party, I mean.

You see, my boy, you can't afford to waste time just now. This is your working time. It may not seem fair, I know, that the world should judge you, and your youth and inexperience by the highest standard of human success and attain ment, but it does, and we can't change the way of the world. You must now do everything your best, and keep on your company behavior all the time. It is the man with only one suit of clothes and a small salary, Telemachus, who at all times must be polite and agreeable and a fault less observer of all points and forms of etiquette The man worth $100,000 may trample over your corns, walk across your wife's train, cat pie with a knife, and take his soup with a swish and a swoop that sounds like a horse walking in the mud, and his standing in society isn't affected by it. But you can't afford these expensive luxuries on your present salary, my boy. Thompson, the poet, who wrote so much in praise of early rising, rarely got out of bed before eleven o'clock, and wrote most of these very poems, indeed, while lying in bed. He used to be seen walking, or rather lounging about in Lord Burlington's gardens, with his hands crowed into his pockets, lazily biting off the sunny sides of the peaches. But, when you can duplicate "The Seasons," you may lie in bed till noon, all day, if you please, and the world will still thank you for living. When you have written so much, so vigorous and so beautiful poetry as Mr. Tennyson has, my son, when you can command $50 a line for your poetry, you can afford to write as poor poetry as Mr. Tennyson now does. But don't try it now, my boy.

There is hardly an adult person living but is sometimes troubled with kidney difficulty, which is the most prolific and dangerous cause of all diseases. There is no sort of need to have any form of kidney or urinary trouble
