for the attention of the occupants of the stalls. Modest and unassuming, she hardly knew her modesty was gone before she was the talk of the clubs, and "swells" and men of all degrees haunted her, sent her bouquets, jewels, notes and whatnot. Her figure was perfect, her face of fascinating beauty, and while the art and talent were credited with drawing the enormous audiences that crowded the theatre, it was an open secret that the little beauty had more to do with the business than all the rest. She had been well brought up, had had the care of a good mother and an honest father. When the father died misfortune came all at the father died misfortune came all at once, and Edna, being the oldest, began to look for something to do to help in sup-porting the family. There were at that time few employments open to women of gentle breeding, and with that mistaken idea so many girls have that the stage is an artistic profession, she found herself doing small parts in a theatre. The bur lesque fever began and raged violently, and a little part in a popular extravaganza was given to the young debutante. At there came a more attractive woman. was given to the young debutante.
