THURSDAY EVEN'G, MARCH 29, 1883

KALSTROM'S WIFE. "The sun is bright, the sky is clear, The wind blows soft and free; For that the larder runneth low, Go thou ashere," said she.

"Keep thou the watch, then, wife of mine: Farewell, farewell !" he cried. The lake was blue, away he flew, Across the waters wide.

The shining hours ran on apace. Till day was almost done ; Then, swift and dark, the angry clouds

Put out the sullen sun. The flerce winds roared, the tempest beat; Brave Kalstrom gave a moan ; Far up within the lighthouse tower

His young wife watched alone. Three times his trusty boat he launched, With strong, determined hands: And thrice the rude waves hurled it back

Upon the treacherous sands. But as with straining eyes he gazed, Clear shining like a star, The red rays from the lighthouse tower

Streamed steadily and far! Day dawned, day waned, but o'er the lake Still swept the furious biast. All day, all night, young Kalstrom raged-

A lion caged at last. " Now, by you heavens!" he cried, " not here Another night I'll tarry; Come life or death, I'll risk the waves

And bread to Lisa carry !" Up in the lonely lighthouse tover Pale Lisa prayed and wept; While round her lashed by furious winds, The mad white surges leapt.

O weary watch! O doleful days! O pain of heart and limb! O awful dread, when far away Upon the world's wide rim

She saw a little dancing fleck ! Was it a boat? A boat? Dear God, on those wild howling waves, What keel might hope to float?

Swiftly the darksome night came down, The world was blotted out, When from below her lotty tower She heard her husband's shout:

"Ho, Lisa! ho! a rope! a rope!" The casement wide she flings; The cold spray dashes in her face-The boat beneath her swings!

Swiftly the knotted noose she threw "Now pull, lass, pull!" cried he; While up his costly freight she drew Safe from the hungry sea.

Back sped the coll. Beneath his arms Scarce had he drawn it tight, When great waves swamped the rocking boat And swept it out of sight;

While he clung quivering to the wall, All bruised and sore bestead. The raging surf beneath his feet, The blinding storm o'erhead! Then cheerily rang Lisa's voice

Through the tumultuous din: "Hold fast, bold fast, my husband brave, For thou and I will win!" On the taunt rope she tugged and strained; Up, up he climbed and swung, hile to each crevice in the wall With hands and feet he clung, Till he could see her soft, dark eyes Above the window-sill. Then came a mighty sweeping wind,

And wrought them grievous ill! It tore his strong hands from the wall, It hurled him in the lake; Drowning the suriek of wild dismay

From Lisa's lips that brake But, swift as thought, her brave young arms Paid out the lengthening line;

It held him in the rushing surge-'Twas like a hand divine. Then once, once more that faithful wife

Her heavy task essayed: Up, up beside the lighthouse tower Once more the strong man swayed. He grasped the window-sill at last-

O Kalstrom, vell your eyes, For freathless on the oaken floor Your per rless Lisa lies. Nay, ask me not! My lips refuse

To tell the direful tale, Lest woman's cheek should turn too white And feeble hearts should quail.

But oh, ye high souls, who have borne All pangs for love's sweet sake. Nor shrank beside the cruel rack, The fagot or the stake;

Ye faithful ones, who, undismayed, For love have yielded life, Open your ranks and give her room-Brave Kalstrom's braver wife! -Julia C. R. Dorr, in " Our Continent."
