THE GETHEANS.

THEIR FORTY-LIGHTH ANNIVERSARY Thoughtful Orations, Fine Speaking, Taste

Good Music. The forty eighth anniversary of the Gethean literary society of Franklin and Marshall college was held in Fulton opera house Friday evening. The hall was well filled by a well pleased audience. The stage was not elaborately but tastefully and handsomely decorated. At the back ground was a mass of beautiful growing plants and flowers, above which was an arch of gas jets forming the words in the original Greek letters, "Genestho Phos"—"Let there be light," it being the motto of the society. From the flies at the front of the stage was suspended a very handsome of the society. From the fles at the front of the stage was suspended a very handsome bell shaped design of various selections of pretty flowers, to the left of which was a wreath of evergreen enclosing the figures "'33," made of pure white flowers, while at the right a similar wreath enclosed the figures "'83." Festoons of evergreen hung pendeut above the stage, and at either side stood large vases containing handsome palms. At eight o'clock the officers of the college and the speakers of the evening filed into the hall and took seats upon the stage. The evening's programme was opened with an overture—'Golden Fleece"-by the orchestra, after which Rev. J. T. Satchell, pastor of the Duke street Methodist church, led in prayer, and the first orator of the evening was introduced. Thoughts About Truth.

Salutatory—"The Aspiration for Truth"—O. P. Steckel, Statington, Pa. In fitting words the gentleman first welcomed the audience, and then entering on his theme, began by saying: There is an ultimate and specific design in universal creation. The kingdoms of the world which are subardinated to man although them are subordinated to man, although they enter not in the true sphere of science, although they do not strive after certain ideals to fulfil a particular destiny, yet they may all be made subversive to man's physical, intellectual and moral welfare. In attempting a dissertation on the aspira tions for truth we must assume the pre-sence of beings capable of entering into the realms of ideas. Being lighted by a spark divine, man alone enters into this sphere. To him is alloted a specific power ing glimpses of the infinite itself. Increase is no subject within the whole range of knowedge so universally interesting as that of the plurality of worlds. It commands the sympathies and appeals to the judgment of men of all nations. Before the starry heavens had been so carefully studied and the truths of astronomy had been demonstrated before tronomy had been demonstrated, before Only first-class workmen can tronomy had been demonstrated, planets make them, and, as yet, we have not been able to make sufficient and poets sung of them as the homes of quantities to get the price lower the gods. It was not until the form and motions of the earth had been discovered, not until Galileo revealed to us the conditions of the planets, and Kepler calcu lated the orbit of each one, that analogy compelled us to believe that on those planets as well as here life exists. We live in a world which is no exception among the heavenly bodies, and which has not received the least mark of distinction. It is the third of the planets revolving around 15 yard Lengths of Summer the sun. There are only four of the planet of our own system, the inhabitants which can know that the earth exists. The absurdity of such an opinion was soon discerned and is now dismissed. founders of American civilization and literature. But the life of these early set-tiers left no leisure for refinement; they had to conquor nature before admiring it, to feed and clothe before analyzing them-selves. "The need that pressed sorest was to vanquish the seasons, the ocean, the forest." But amidst all the cares and anxieties their desire for the establishment of a permanent literature received due attention. Among this group of brave and patriotic men appear one above all the rest, a man, brave and courageous— Captain John Smith, who stands at the captain John Smith, who stands at the head of his colony, guarding it with fatherly care. He was, perhaps, the last professional knight-errant that the world saw; a man, as Tyler says, "who made all men either his hot friends or his hot enemies," a resolute man, who was known not call as the most convicuous person not only as the most conspicuous person in the first successful American colony, but the writer of the first book in American literature. As a writer, his merits are really great, and during his short sojourn in this country he did more than any other Englishman to make an American nation and an American literature possible. From him we may turn to the first writer of verse the brave and fearless George From him we may turn to the first writer of verse, the brave and fearless George Sandys, and his writings lead us to believe that the wilds of America, even at this early date, furnished to the world a man whose abilities as a writer and poet, even to the present day, are not forgotten. He made his appearance at the colonies when it was in its most dire afflictions, but amidst all of them he pursued the great task of translating Ovid, and his work proved a success, and exhibited the won derful skill of a genius, whose contemporaries, of high intellectual standing, even in England pronounced it a most excellent work. Others might be mentioned of equal popularity of this new era in the lent work. Others might be mentioned of equal popularity of this new era in the world's history. Ever since their time, the literature of our nation has been gradually growing, steadfastly maintaining its own, until it now stands an an equal footing with that of any European nation. However, its mission is by no means ended, and its glorious end has as yet not been attained. Eulogy—"Ralph Waldo Emerson"— M. H. Mill, Dillingersville, Pa. It is, the speaker said, with feelings of pure delight that we sometimes roll away the marble door of the tomb to learn lessons from the more sacred and thought more sublime. We go to Rome and see on the walls of Sistine chapel and there behold the prophets painted in fresco by Michael Angelo and we are lifted up into a higher world of being; while in our own country we turn our eyes toward Cencord and there behold the transparent and beautiful life of the immortal Emerson and we are filled with a similar admiration. If we ask ourselves, what brings us into such close communion with the thoughts of these men, we are not always able to define clearly every reason; but we know they some above the ordinary walks of life. The life of Emerson was a gentle youth of purest spirations, a manhood devoted to the elegant position in word and act of moral truth, an old age of serious benevolence. In him the vivid imagination of a poet and the intellectual keenness and profundity of a philosopher were combined with that childlike simplicity and almost divine humility, which made him the idol of thousands. As a poet Emerson has b compared to an Æolian harp, which now gives and then waywardly withholds its music. He is no universal poet like Longfellow; not every body reads his poems, but those who like them will be sure to love them. It is as chiefly gained his fame. Here he stands preeminently without a rival, among all the names of literature. The speaker then cited some of the author's chief works and pointed out wherein lay their harms and characteristics. In speaking of his religious life we are prehaps verturing upon delicate grounds; yet it was such a nature that we cannot pass his monument by without inscribing our humble tribute. Emerson was a theist of the school of Gothe and Carlyle, a mystic who accepted devoutedly the theism of within his own soul. With him religion was not a profession, not a system of forms or ceremonies, but a life. As a man Emerson is the natural as well as the finest flower of our world-life. His thoughts have taken hold of the minds of the thinking part of our vast population, as have the thoughts of no other man. He fought the battle against error and yice, beauty of truth. The speaker traced in fine expression the closing carreer of Emerson, told how calmly he met death, as the beautiful soul of the great philosopher departed to its eternal rest has indeed passed into the great beyond; his eloquent voice is hushed forever, but as the warm April showers cause the grass to grow over his grave, so let his flowers of thought grow green in our memories as we drink deep at the pure fountains of Music - March-" Freuhlingslust," Oration-"Reformatory Institutions consideration. For success in this work every possible means should be employed for developing and working on the higher feelings of the prisoners, by religious instruction and wholesome attendance. Under their present supervision our prisons are but schools of crime, institutions for the graduation and turning loose upon society hordes of criminals whose every impulse towards what is decent and hon orable is stifled and replaced by the base desires of natures physically and morally degraded. To carry into effect rightful and pure principles it is necessary to banish all party influences from the selection of officers necessary to institutions. Until we have banished all politics from the management of our jails, penitentiaries management of our jails, penitentiaries and poor houses and adopted some system of humane treatment and moral culture for their inmates these institutions will be a disgrace to our civilization and a danger

Gethean Oration—"The Spirit of Moderation."—G. C. Stahl, Milton, Pa. Side by side wherever man is found and creation is displayed in all its grandeur and sublimity we behold the two great composites of the universe, nature and the soul. The one speaking to man, the other to God and both bringing man and God nearer together. Night after night the stars appear with their admonishing smile and day after day the sun enhances the charms of creation, drives away the blind shadows of night and cheers all earth's inhabitants with its warmth and light. habitants with its warmth and light. Nature has delights to heal the most beart rendering anguish and to fill the heart with love and meekness, but it must be appreciated if its end and purpose would be fulfilled. The spirit of moderation should find expression in every movement whether private or public, in the graces of the social circle us well as in the marts of trade or in the halls of legislation. Man's mind must not be turned to one single purpose to the exclusion of all the rest, when the frivolities of riches, of pleasures of honor, of praise root out simplicity and truth, falsehood reigns supreme, and truth recedes, to the invisible. By knowledge we are enlightened, but ignorance is darkness. Ideas are yet to be revealed and man most reveal them. To present to the world a literature unrevealed and man most reveal them. To achieve this culture is necessary, and its harmonizing effects can be felt in every age and clime. It is culture that causes the mind to call that apparent which visionary. In looking over the history of the world we find many men who have and honor, apparently through just means, displaying rare genius, but when triumph ant victory and immortal fame come to crown their glowing career their ambitious motives become known and their popularity fades away. Their noble deeds lose their lustre in consequence of their frantic ndeavor to gain renown. On the other hand, the men whose epitaphs need not be nscribed on their monuments are those who have thoughtfully and truthfully worked their way in calm deliberation. Though storms assail us and dark clouds gather around our pathway through life, if we but follow the right in due time God's angels will withdraw the curtain and we shall rejoice in the sunlight of immortality.

Masic - Waltz - "Herzenstone" Hardly on any similar occasion has the anniversary of the Gothean been more successful and satisfactory. The orations were notable for choice thought and language, and were in every instance deliv ered with fine oratorial effect and were received with commensurate attention by the appreciative audience. There were no floral tributes offered to the speakers, but there were a number of suggestively appropriate packages tendered to them.

The music of the evening was furnished by the college orchestra, whose fine renditions of their various musical selections were of marked excellence and formed one of the most enjoyable features of the evening. After benediction by Rev. Dr. Apple, the anniversary was closed. committee of arrangements were : F. C. Cook, chairman; W. R. Brinton, J. H. Kerchner, J. F. Moyer, S. E. Stofflet, C. B. Schneider, D. F. Mauger.
