MONDAY EVENING, JUNE 11, 1888. Fresh Produce.

Germantown Telegraph. Of late years in Philadelphia we observed with increasing interest the powerful organization and extensive enterprise and development of the wholesale commission trade in fresh produce, chiefly agricultual. Of course this branch of business is carried on very much more extensively in New York city, which is a larger center of population and trade. But it is also remarkably extensive and active in Baltmore, Boston, and most of the other com mercial cities of the North and West. In Philadelphia for a long time this branch of business was greatly discouraged in consequence of the prejudice arising out of its supposed antagonism to the interests of the farmer as well as of the consumer. But during all that period when Phila delphia had the immense arrangments for the retail sale of fresh produce and no wholesale trade worth speaking of, it is well-known that the wholesale dealers of Boston and New York always had the pick of all the best produce which was purchased for cash, leaving us only the refuse. At the same time it is well known that during the height of the season the farmers who depended on this market were obliged to lose heavily in consequence of the extreme low prices and the absence of any large wholesale arrangements for disposing of the farm produce on a great scale immediately upon its arrival. It used to be said by the croakers of Philadelphia that this evil arose from the absence of any great demand for produce for the supply of extensive shipping in port or of clubs, fashionable restaurants, and large hotels as in New York.

But no sooner did the wholesale produce trade become fully organized here than it found an immense field, the working of which has benefited the farmers by affording them a very much larger, stead-ier and better market for the produce than they had ever previously enjoyed. The shipping demand has increased here be yond all expectations, and there can be no doubt that this item, although it escapes remark, has really exercised considerable influence in advancing the commerce of the port. Another fact has been that the fashionable restaurants, club houses, boarding houses and hotels in the city have been, under the influence of the improved condition of the markets, better supplied with superior quantities of eatables, thereby increasing the attractions of the city for travelers, visitors, sojourners and business men. We may also say that the farmers of this region have thus been able to put more capital into their own business, to give their packages of produce more care in the details, and generally to make them better worth the increased prices given for them. All this we con sider to be in reality a natural result of the prosperity and extensive organization of the wholesale trade spoken of.
