A LONG NAP.

In the Arms of Morpheus from Christman A singular case of lethargic existence now the talk of Newtown, Conn. The sleeper is Sherman W. Platt, who has always resided with his father, Mr. Wenzer Platt, a well to do farmer whose place is located four miles distant from Newtown Centre. Young Mr. Platt is a well built man about thirty five years of age. He had always assisted his father in the working of a large farm. During the spring of 1882 he was attacked with malaria, and while he was treated for it and appeared to have recovered was never since wholly free from its effects. With the arrival of summer he worked on the farm, displaying few comatose symptoms, and during the haying period was as active as any. One day, however, he was affected more than usual by the heat, and, while not overcome by it, lay down on the hay under a tree to rest, hoping to feel better after a short nap. It proved to be a long one, however, for although his days of consecutive sleep did not then begin the influence which tended to make the special diseases for which it is offered. It protracted sleep possible instituted its work. While under the tree the belief is entertained by his mother that he suffered sunstroke, for on being removed to the house he acted and talked strangely, and never since seemed to be himself. Whether it was malaria, sun stroke or the two combined that produced his present condition or not, certain it is that after last Thanksgiving day (November 33) he kept himself aloof, remained most of the time within doors and a few days before Christmas sank into a deep sleep in his bed, continuing there till the latter part of January, scarcely changing his position or recognizing persons in attendance and not once arousing from his change in the sleeper, which was manifested by an inclination to move, but he Singular Symptoms.

What influence kept life in him is more than anyone can tell. He was bolstered up in bed, still with closed eyes and mouth sealed against speech. He expressed by sound or motion no evidence of suffering, and his silence seemed to indi cate that his wish was simply to be left alone. Later he was assisted to a sitting position, but the affectionate words of his relatives were uttered in his ears in vain. At last he was taken from the bed and his clothes put on. This was brought about with difficulty, as he was like one with no life—no muscular power. In April he began to walk tremblingly, at first holding on by articles of furniture and afterwards he could stand and walk walk alone. No kind appeal succeeded in drawing from him even the reply of a syllable. As the days came and went he walked from his bed to the chair and back again to bed. Daily, like an infant, he was dressed and undressed. Evidences of returning strength have been marked since the arrival of warm weather, but reason only in part. A while ago he scented the way to the household pantry, and he has since at nearly regular inter vals oscillated between the chair and cupboard shelves When moving his eyes have opened partially, and he has ut tered involuntary words only, but none which could be understood or accepted as intelligent. On rising in the morning after sleeping soundly at night he is reg ularly dressed, like a baby, and led to his chair, where he immediately sinks to sleep When hunger prompts he rises, proceed: to the pantry, eats, returns to the chair, sleeps and when night comes is undressed and goes to sleep again. In winter and early spring or before the nature of his strange case was known many visitors were admitted to see the person who could sleep so long and live, but of late no one is allowed to see the patient save the im mediate members of the family. The period of his lethargy at this writing
