but this is now declared not to be the case. A professor has found out all about it. An insect? No! It is a fungus-nothing but fungus. The insect theory is all in my eye. Hence, it is the fungus we have to deal with, and this fungus grows from seedlike spores, which spores germinate spring, attach themselves to the bark from the outside and penetrate to the new wood that is being formed, and on this delicate substance it lets loose the dogs of war and the result is the nusty looking, shapelsss and disgusting appearing lump, wart, excressence, or what not. The learned professor referred to then goes on and tells us how it progresses in its efforts on the track of destruction ; then tells us the very important fact that it is American by birth, and claims Virginia as its native land. Well, this is something. The idea that, after finding out that this knot is not produced by an insect, but is a member of the fungoid family, and was discovered by a fungologist should be scouted by everybody! Now, to divide the honors nicely, we suggest to the professor most respectfully to admit that the veritable knot is the work of a fungicorous insect. VILLAGE GOSSIP.

Some Comments on the Modern "Tattler." For the INTELLIGENCER. In the New Era of last week a local is printed headed, "Chestnut Level Growing Lively," undoubtedly contributed by some dissension loving resident of Chestnut Level. There is nothing in the article worthy attention, it being merely about a squabble among some boys, and a little boy fight is not very entertaining or instructive reading to the readers of the Era, certainly; nor is it such matter as a paper that pretends to be a paper, and fill "a vacancy," should allow to swell its col writer to criticise the journal that prints such stuff as much as it is to call to account the one who writes it. There are slanderer, and when it comes to slandering one's home, where one must need look for friends and good-fellowship if any place in the world, may be merely to gratify a personal animosity, it looks bad, in deed. Those who have had an experience in village life known full well what a publie nuisance and private disgrace the tattlers and busybodies of the village are, even if the village only reaches the dignity of two or three houses gathered together. Small matters of no interest to any one in the world outside the village are given all the publicity possible, as in the above mentioned case and every thing made worse than it was by love of meddling and misrepresentation. And generally the ones who post the short comings of others before the world, are the blackest sheep in the flock. What if they did have a little spat at Chestnut Level wherein one "boy pinched another," and so on, what do other folks care about that, that some one who likes to "be in print" need publish it, and season the batch with lies about the "gentler sex mixed up in it" to give it a doubtful flavor? It certainly would have been more creditable to the village correspondent of the Era to try to hide from the world such little things of disgrace than to circulate them among disgrace than to circulate them among the such little things of disgrace than to circulate them among the such little things of disgrace than to circulate them among the such little things of disgrace than to circulate them among the such little things of disgrace than to circulate them among the such little things of disgrace than to circulate them among the such little things of the such little things of disgrace than to circulate them among the such little things of the such little things of disgrace than to circulate them among the such little things of the sheep in the flock. What if they did have disgrace than to circulate them among strangers to show "what fools we mortals And the Era correspondent should

to endeavor to hide home's faults. A Story Told by Gov. Allen, of Ohio,

Men of Our Time. When Senator Allen arrived in Washington in 1837 he found the city filled with strangers, who had come from all parts of the country to be present at the inauguration of President-elect Van Buren. Among them were a number of leading men from Ohio, and they occupied so much of their newly elected senator's time that it was not until late on the night of the 3d of March that he had an opportunity of speaking informally and freely with his life long friend, President Jackson. On that night he entered the White House, a senator of the nation, to see the great man who, little more than twenty years before, in the Lynchburg revers had langehed at large lange and recommendation. Georgia, secretary of state and ex minister to Spain, were already in the room; and Jackson, himself active and to a certain extent restless, as usual, stood in the mid dle of the floor, smoking a short corncob pipe. He congratulated Allen warmly upon his election to the Senate, and then calling to a young Irishman who acted as his body servant and waiter, turned to his visitors and said:

"Gentlemen, I think the occasion will warrant me in breaking over one of my own rules. Let us drink a little Madeira. The wine was brought. Jackson took a small glassful-it was the first he had been known to touch for several monthsand then, asking his friends to excuse him for a few moments, he finished writing a letter upon which he was engaged, sealed, directed it, and, lighting his cob pipe again, took a whiff or two. Then he stood silently watching the face of a tall, oldfashioned clock which stood in one corner. It was five minutes before midnightfive minutes before the advent of the day on which Andrew Jackson would cease to be president of the United States. Slowly the minute hand moved on the dial. The silence in the room became almost pain ful. It was broken by the clear sharp bell of the clock striking the last hour of a day which had gone forever. Then Jackson, starting suddenly, and looking toward his friends, said, with a quick, nervous langh: "Gentlemen, I am no longer president of the United States, but as good a citizen as any of you.

It would appear that this unsightly and injurious enemy of the plum and cherry trees is most likely to be got rid of by any means yet devised, though we are now told what it is and what causss it.
