THE APPORTIONMENT.

THE ISSUE CLEARLY DEFINED.

An Able speech by Senator Gordon upon the Question at Issue in the Legislature.

In his speech at the Democratic meeting in Milton, Northumberland county last evening, upon the apportionment Senator James Gay Gordon, of Philadelphia, said:

This is the first campaign within my knowledge when the voters of the state have been brought face to face with the question whether their constitution or a decree of a party caucus is the stronger. It has been no unusual thing for constitutional principles or questions of construction to be involved in political contests. In such instances fairly debatable propositions upon which thoughtful men differed have been submitted for decision to the people. In all such cases, however, the support of the constitution and obedience to it have been admitted as uncontested duties—the discussion has proceeded upon other lines. Now, however, the naked issue before the people is whether they will justify a party that deliberately, and for partisan purposes, disobeys the mandate and resists the execution of the constitution. I purpose showing that it tipped off all manner of deceptions and the simple and important issue before the people. For the purpose of an orderly presentation of this subject I shall first discuss the constitutional command, then the constitutional obligation resting upon the Legislature for obedience to that command, then the deliberate manner in which the stalwart Republicans have refused to discharge their obligations, and last the reason for this disobedience and its result to the people. I shall embrace what I have to say within these five prominent thoughts:

First, as to the command. That there may be no question raised as to the accuracy of any words or statement of mine upon this subject I shall go to the fountain head and read the exact language of the first article of the constitution as it was adopted by the people in 1874, in the 18th section of the 21 article contains this direction to the Legislature: "The general assembly at its first session after the adoption of this constitution, and immediately thereafter, shall divide the state into senatorial and representative districts agreeably to the provisions of the two next preceding sections." This 18th section it will be observed, is a clear, direct and unambiguous command that the Legislature shall do a specific thing. It contains no qualification, it leaves no room for the discretion of the General Assembly and is couched in the most direct, positive and mandatory terms. It does not state that the ordinary or usual subject of legislation but is a direction as to the manner in which the people desire the law making department of their government to be constituted. It is therefore fundamental and of the nature of all legislation in this connection it is worthy of note that this command is contained in the article of the constitution on the "Legislature" and not in the article on "legislation." If the direction to apportion the state into senatorial and representative districts stood upon the same footing as other directions upon subjects of legislation it would have been placed in the general article on "legislation." But instead of that we find it in that portion of the constitution which prescribes the construction and character of the Legislature itself—the article which precedes the Legislature out of which it grows, from which it derives powers and which antedates all legislation. The command to apportion the state into senatorial and representative districts is as vital, binding and imperative as the command that "the legislative power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a general assembly which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." The command to apportion the state into senatorial and representative districts is as vital, binding and imperative as the command that "the legislative power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a general assembly which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." The command to apportion the state into senatorial and representative districts is as vital, binding and imperative as the command that "the legislative power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a general assembly which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."
