We have taken over position in the deep embrasure of a lofty Gothic window The wall facing us is hang with numerous portraits, and the window looks out upon extensive gardens, which slope down to the edge of a large lake. Miss Depford, the lady to whom the above remark was addressed, is a tall, handsome girl, of commanding figure and features; yet the independent, almost super cilious, air which is natural to her causes her to be more generally admired and respeeted than actually liked. Her consin, Harry Depford, a good looking, manly young fellow-more over the inheritor of a vast property and an unencumbered rent roll of £20,000 per annum-stands facing while I, Diana Clive, whith one knee rest ing on the low window seat, complete the group.

Jula and I were the acknowledged rival beauties of the pleasant party collected to gether at Murchiston castle; and yet we two girls were as totally unlike one another as could well be imagined. Blonde and mignonue, and utterly failing in that composure and dignity of manner which were Julia's chief characteristics, I was ever ready to run into any sort of scrape or mischief for the sake of a bit of fua. Both of us were orphans, and both pos sessed but slender means ; there, however all point of resemblance ceased. So entirely opposed were we that but for one reason there probably would have been no rivalry between us; nevertheless, that reason was sufficient to make Julia Dep ford hate me. The cause of her dislike was her cousin Harry's unconcealed ad miration for me, whom he had met for the first time at a ball in London, a few weeks before our meeting at Murchiston. She, on the other hand, having been brought up with him from childhood, and being two or three years his senior, had been ac customed to lord it over him as long as she could remember. The subject of dis cussion with which my tale commences was the evil repute attached to the galiery we were visiting. In a recess in the wall, exactly opposite the window in which we stood, was a full-length marble figure, which was the more remarkable, being the sole piece of statuary in that long corridor. The figure represented a cavalier, with flowing locks and garments as worn in the time of Charles I, and it certainly did not belie the epithet of handsome I had ap. plied to it.

ercised some powerful fascination over me. As I gazed at the marble countenance those eyes of stone seemed to attract me with a force I was unable to reaist. In life I had never seen a being I so much admired. Miss Depford's parting words as we each retired to our own quarters for the night were to remind me of my wager. I replied I had not forgotten, and I would culighten her curiosity next morning.

My small but comfortable room was the only one in a passage leading to a narrow staircase, which communicated directly with the haunted gallery. When I entered I found it wanted but three quarters of an hour to midnight, and did not think it worth while retiring to rest.

Throwing myself into an arm chair, opened a novel to pass away the time. read fitfully, only half following the story, my eyes straying constantly to the clock on the mantlepiece. At 5 minutes before 12 I got up, and drawing a shawl about my shoulders-for the night was chilly, and I still wore my low evening dress-I stole from the room, carefully closing the door behind me. I had taken the precaution to put my feet into a pair of bedroom slippers, and, as I crept down the stone stairs, there could be no footfall distinguishable to the most wakeful ears.

I was glad to remember Harry's room was at the other side of the house from mine, and as his cousin slept nearly opposite, fear of her mockery would keep him from stirring. My heart beat strangely, more with excitement than fear, and I entered the long deserted gallery which, but a few hours earlier, had been echoing with peals of thoughtless laughter. I stole along cautiously; gradually I became ac customed to the silent weirdness of the dene. The night was not dark. By the pallid moon I could distinguish the features of the grim old Rotherams, looking more ghostly than ever by the cold blue light cast over them. I turned to look out of the window at the scene beneath. I had often thought how beautiful it must look by night. The moon reflected in the placid water, the long shadows thrown by the trees, the hooting of some night owls only breaking the stillness of the air, all contributed to the grandeur of the sight. As I looked in wonder and admiration, a sudden feeling that I was not alone, that some one, something, I knew not what, was close beside me, came over me. For a few seconds I stood still, not daring to move, then, by an impulse, I turned round resolutely and came face to face withnot the marble statue, it was no longer visible, but its exact fac simile in-was it flesh and blood, or People, as a rule, are supposed to shud ler at the presence of an apparition of this world.
