CHRISTMAS GREETING.

TUESDAY FVENING, DEC. 11, 1888,

RECEIDAN'S RIDE.

How the Poem was Written Col. F. A. Burr has written for the Philadelphia Press, a very interesting story of how the poem "Sheridan's Ride" came to be written. Burr had it from the reterau actor and elecutronist, James F.

Murdoch:

Murdoch said: Soon after the battle of Codar Creek I came up to Cincinnati and was visiting Mr. Cyrus Garrett, whom we called 'Old Cyclopa.' He was T. Buchan an Read's brother in-law, and with him the poet made his home. The ladies of Cincinnati had arranged to give me a reception, that finally turned into an ovation. I had given a great many readings to raise funds to assist their soldiers' aid society, and they were going to present me with a silk flag. Pike's opera house had been secured, the largest place of amusement in the city, and they had made every arrangement to have the reception a very dramatic event. The morning of the day it was to take place Read and I were, as usual, taking our breakfast late. We had just finished, but were still sitting at the table chatting. Mr. Garrant, the brother in-law, who was a business man and guided by business a business man and guided by business habits, came in while we were thus loung ing. He were an air of impatience and carried a paper in his hand. He walked directly up to Read, unfolded a copy of Harper's Weekly and hell it up before the man so speaked with the state of the st man so singularly gifted as both poet and painter.

"The whole front of the paper was covered with a striking picture representing Sheridan s ated on his black horse, just emerging from a cloud of dust that rolled up from the highway as he dashed along, followed by a few troopers.
"There,' said Mr. Garrett, addressing

Read, 'see what you have missed. You ought to have drawn that picture yourself and gotten the credit of it; it is just in your line. The first thing you know some body will write a poem on that event and then you will be beaten all around.

"Read looked at the picture rather quizzically, a look which I interrupted by saying: 'Old Cyclops is right, Read, the subject and the circumstance are worth a Wild Steed of the Plains, and half a dozen other poems of a like character."

"Filled with the idea that this was a good chance for the gifted man, I said:
Read, you are losing a great opportunity.
If I had such a poem to read at my recep tion to night, it would made a great hit "But, Murdoch, you can't order a poem as you would a new coat. I can't write anything in a few hours that will do either you or me any credit, 'he replied, rather "I turned to him and said : 'Read, two or three thousand of the warmest hearts in Cincinnati will be in Pike's opera house to night at that presentation. It will be a very significant affair. Now, you go and give me anything in rhyme, and I will give it a deliverance before that splendid audience, and you can then revise and polish it before it goes into print.' This view seemed to strike him favorably, and he finally said: 'Well! We'll see what can be done,' and he went upstairs to his room.

"A half hour later Hattie, his wife, a brilliant woman, who is now residing in Philadelphia, came down and said : He wants a pot of strong tea. He told me to get it for him and then he would look the door and must not be disturbed unless the house was afire.

matters in the family circle, we had almost forgotten the poet up stairs. Diu-ner had been announced and we were about to sit down, when Read came in and beckoned me to come. When I reached the room, he said :
"' Murdoch, I think I have about what you want.' He read it to me, and with an enthusiasm that surprised him, I said it is just the thing."

"We dined, and at the proper time Read and I, with the family, went to Pike's opera house. The building was crowded in every part. Upon the stage were sitting 200 maimed soldiers, each with an arm or a leg off. General Joe Hooker was to present me with the flag the ladies had made, and at the time appointed we marched down the stage towards the foot lights, General Hooker bearing the flag, and I with my arm in his. Such a storm of applause as greeted the appearance. never heard before or since. Behind and on each side of us were the rows of crippled soldiers, in front the vast audience, cheering to the echo. Hooker qualled before the warm reception and, growing nervous, said to me in an undertone

'I can stand the storm of battle, but this is too much for me ' "Leave it to me,' said I; 'I am an old hand behind the footlights. I will divert the strain from you.' So quickly I dropped upon my knee, took a fold of the silken flag and pressed it to my lips. This by-play created a fresh storm of euthusiasm, but it steadied Hooker and he presented the flag very gracefully, which I accepted in fitting words. I then drew the poem Read had written from my pocket, and with proper introduction, began reading it to the audierce. The vast assemblage became as still as a church during prayer time, and I read the three first verses without a pause, and then read the fourth. As this verse was fluished the audience broke into a tumult of applause. Then I read with all the spirit I could com

The Conclusion. "The sound of my voice uttering the last word had not died away when cheer after cheer went up from the great concourse that shook the building to its very found-ation. Ladies waved their hankerchiefs and men their hats, until worn out with the fervor of the hour. They then de-manded the author's name and I pointed to Read, who was sitting in a box, and he acknowledged the verses. In such a set ting and such an occasion as I have been able only faintly to describe to you, the poem of Sheridan's ride was given to the world. It was written in about three hours, and not a word was ever changed after I read it from the manuscript, ex cept by the addition of the third verse, which records the fifteen mile stage of the

"But there's a road from Winchester town,
A good, broad highway, leading down;
And there, thro' the fla h of the morning

And there, thro the half of night light;
A steed as black as the steeds of night was seen to pass as with eagle flight;
As if he know the terrible need;
He stretched away with the utmost speed;
Hills rose and fell—but his heart was gay,
With Sheridan fifteen miles away.

"This Mr. Read wrote while on his way shortly after I first read the poem, to at-tend a birthday reception to William Cul-

"Mr. Read read the poem, thus completed, at Mr. Bryant's birthday party. The great old man listened to every line of it, and then taking the younger poet by the hand, said, with a great warmth :
