in it on the open prairies, is the extreme probability that they will freeze to death. As nothing can prevent a man from losing his way in a blizzard, so nothing in the shape of clothing can prevent his freezing to death if he cannot find sheiter from the cold which follows. It is very difficult to tell just when it stops snowing. The wind keeps the air filled with icy particles long after the clouds have passed away, and so fariously is the light snow driven by the gale that even then the vision is almost as circumscribed as before. A stranger experiencing this stage of blizzard would protest that he never saw it snow so fast, but in the momentary lulis of the wind he would see the cloudless sky and know that the blinding blast was but the afterclap of the great storm. There will be drifts ten feet high packed so hard that a human foot will sink in them but a few inches. Then there will be acres of wind other. swept earth as destitu e of snow as in mid summer. To live in these blizzards is almost an impossibility. No horse can be made to face the blast, and only men who have long been accus omed to the rigors of the North can breathe in them. There is something suffocating about the wind. The nostrils and tongue seem ready to congeal and the eyes ache far back in their sockets. Ten feet away may yawn a chasm, yet the driving snows will hide it from view There is a ringing, roaring noise, such as is sometimes faintly beard under telegraph wires on a clear, cold night. At times the rear of the storm will resemble nothing so much as escaping steam, like a thousand locomotives blowing off at once. When this dies out for an instant the ringing noise will rise and fall, sometimes a shrick and sometimes a hum A Household Tragedy. When the last great blizzard swept over the country, the Nelsons found themselves with only a little straw near at hand and their necessi ties very great. The nearest stack was only halt a mile from their house, but they feared to brave the storm in an effort to reach it. Hoping that the tempest would soon

Doling out the straw sparingly they managed to keep their hovel tolerably warm, and to cook such food as they were sup-plied with. Economical as they were with the straw, however, it was spent be-fore the storm showed any signs of abating, and as the cold grew more intense it became a question of securing more fuel or freezing to death. It is believed that they realized the desperate situation they were in and the possibility that if they once ventured out in the blinding gale they might not return. It is known that they reached the straw stack, and, each having secured a load, started back ; but in changing their course they lost their way, and wandered aimlessly about until, exhausted and be numbed with cold, they could go no further. The father then appears to have dug a cave in a huge enow drift at a point as little exposed as possible, into which he put the children. He then
