MURDERED IN JAIL CONVICT TAYLOR BILLS HIS KEEPER

Statement of the Frisoner-Ifis Record of Crime Since the Days of the Reading Horse Gaug. Keeper Michael F. Doran, of the East-ern penitentiary, Philadelphia, was seen from the corridor to be dying in cell A.

1,483, on Saturday about 9 a. m. The right side of his skull had been battered in so that a man's fist could have been inserted between the shattered bones. His brains protruded from the terrible wound and a large pool of blood had settled in a slight depression of the cell yard floor. It was at once suspected that the inmate of the cell, James Taylor, had committed the crime, and the officers attempted to get into the cell by the door leading to the yard, where the dying keeper was breathing his last. The cell door was found to be fastened on the inside. Through the barred window, however, could be seen the crouching figure of Taylor, who refused to say a word in reply to questions addressed to bim.

A detachment was sent around to the door of the cell opening on the main corridor, where an entrance was easily made and Taylor captured without resistance. At 10 o'clock Doran died in the hospital of the prison, and the coroner was summoned There was no eye witness to the killing of the keeper, but from the admissions of the slayer and the circumstances sur rounding the case the following is a far statement of the facts : Keeper Doran was on his early morning rounds, transferring the prisoners on the corridor from the yards, where they had been having an airing, into their cells. As he went from cell to cell be carried a long iron bar with which to fasten the doors of the cells, each bar being left on the outside of the yard gate. Unlocking the gate of No. A. 1,483, he took up the bar and entered the yaid. Taylor was waiting for him behind the gate, and as he entered struck him on the back of the neck with a large wooden bobbin from his loom. This felled the unfortunate kreper to the floor, and as he dropped his iron 'ar Taylor picked it up and battered his skull with the terrible instrument of death. He then probably came out into the corridor, over which ran a railway to the kitchen, and leaned against a bread cart, looking up and down. One of the cooks saw him in his attitude a few minutes after Doran had entered his cell yard. The murderer then went back into his cell, fastening the door leading to the yard by means of the murderous bobbin. The bloody bobbin and the long iron bar were found in the cell, and the prisoner did not deny that he killed the keeper. He said that when he Doran came into the cell yard he (Taylor) struck him with his fist, but no marks were shown. "Then," said Taylor, "I hit him with the bobbin and struck him over the head with the iron bar." Taylor said that he had recently been ill and had been given medicine which he did not relish. He charged Dorau with being responsible for this. Dr. Huidekoper, the coroner's physician, examined the body of the dead keeper, and said that he had evidently been struck first on the back of the head with a wooden weapon and then his skull batter did the deed in a fit of insanity, caused by ed open with some heavy iron instrument. The murderer, Taylor, acts as though insane, but Dr. Robinson, physician at the a quarrel with her husband about the loss guilty, with a recommendation to imprisonment for life. The supreme court granted a new trial, which has terminated in a verdict of not guilty. Ex-Governor Smith, as one of Mitchell's attorneys, did zealous work for his client, thereby incurring the dead batred of the murdered man's brother, Evans Wright, who, in his frenzy over the acquittal of Ben Mitchell, sought to wreak vengeance on the lawyer who so successfully defended him.

who so successfully defended him. Ex.Governor Smith, succeeded Gov-ernor Bullock as governor of Georgia, and held the office as governor of Georgia five years. He is at present one of the railroad commissioners of the state. He won the hatred of the criminal classes during his administration by his refusal to interfere with the sentence of the court.
